FOREWORD

This two-volume Legislative History of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is part of a collection of publications reprinted in 1985 on the 50th anniversary of the Act. The other publications in this reprint series are: the two-volume Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, the two-volume Legislative History of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, and the four-volume set of the Annual Reports of the National Labor Relations Board from 1936 through 1960.

The republication of these documents will assure their ready availability for legal and historical research into the National Labor Relations Act.

STATEMENT OF METHOD FOLLOWED IN PREPARING THIS LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

The documents constituting the legislative history of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 have never before been collected in one place and as the years go by many of them have gone out of print and become increasingly difficult to obtain. It was therefore deemed advisable to reprint all the documents in one collection in a form duplicating the originals as closely as necessary for research. Although many legislative histories are composed in the form of sections of the law followed by the printing of pertinent portions of the legislative material, this form would here be most difficult to execute because of the manner in which the National Labor Relations Act enunciates broad principles rather than technical rules. Moreover, there would have been so much duplication as to render such a scheme quite wasteful. Therefore, this history is composed of a reprint of all the documents accompanied by three exhaustive indexes, the first by sections of the Act, the second by subject matter, and the third by names of persons, cases and organizations which appear in the documents.

The documents are here arranged by the houses in which the document originated, in chronological order. That is, all the Senate documents and proceedings relating to a given bill or resolution until it has been passed by that body, are printed chronologically before printing any of the House documents or proceedings relating thereto. Thus, we start with S. 2926 which was introduced in the Senate in 1934 and follow it with all of the proceedings both on the floor of the Senate and in Senate committees arranged chronologically through the end of 1934. Then we print the first House version of this bill, H. R. 8423, although chronologically it precedes some of the Senate proceedings, and follow it with all proceedings thereon in the House in 1934. These two bills did not come to a vote in 1934 but instead Congress adopted Public Resolution No. 44. The proceedings culminating in the adoption of this resolution began with the introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 143. This resolution is printed followed by all the proceedings thereon in the Senate. Then, House Joint Resolution 375 is printed followed by the subsequent proceedings thereon in the House and the Senate arranged chronologically. This completes the proceedings in the 1934 session of Congress.

For the 1935 session, a similar arrangement is used. All of the documents and proceedings in the Senate, both on the floor of the Senate and in committee, until the bill was passed by the Senate, are printed chronologically before printing any of the House documents, or proceedings, although the House proceedings were taking place virtually concurrently in point of time with the Senate proceedings. After the adoption of the bill by the Senate there is printed in chronological order all of the House documents and proceedings down through the adoption of the Senate bill by the House with amendments. Then in chronological order are the subsequent proceedings skipping back and forth from Senate to House and vice versa.

All documents have been printed so that the pagination of the original document is indicated. Hearings have been reproduced by photo offset so that the reproduction is identical with the original print. Bills have been reset line for line and page for page, including typographical errors. While the Congressional Record and committee reports have not been reset line for line, the original pagination is noted by figures in brackets printed in bold face. For use in indexing and the table of contents we have numbered the pages of this legislative history independently of the page numbers of the original documents. In all instances, the page numbers of this legislative history appear unincumbered by parentheses or brackets while the numbers of the pages of the original documents appear in parentheses or brackets except in the reprinting of the bills, where the reproduction of the original pagination appears in such a position on the page that no confusion can result.

A complete chronological statement of the legislative history of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, with each step arranged without regard to which side of Congress the action occurred, is set forth at pages XI–XV, immediately following this statement.

This legislative history includes only the proceedings which took place in 1934 and 1935 and pertained to the original National Labor Relations Act of 1935. The legislative history of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 is contained in two separate volumes.

The plan of this compilation was worked out and its execution supervised by Ruth Weyand, Assistant General Counsel, National Labor Relations Board. The actual preparation and indexing were done by Louis Schwartz, of the Board's Industrial analysis Branch with the assistance of John Barriere of the University of Chicago.

73D CONGRESS
2D SESSION

S. 2926

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

FEBRUARY 28 (calendar day, MARCH 1), 1934

Mr. WAGNER introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor

A BILL

To equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees, to create a National Labor Board, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Labor Disputes Act."

SEC. 2. The tendency of modern economic life toward integration and centralized control has long since destroyed the balance of bargaining power between the individual employer and the individual employee, and has rendered the individual, unorganized worker helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract, to secure a just reward for his services, and to preserve a decent standard of living, with consequent detriment to the general welfare and the free flow of commerce. Inadequate recognition of the right of employees to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing has been one of the causes of strikes, lockouts, and similar manifestations of economic strife, obstructing commerce and imperiling the general welfare. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of commerce, to encourage the establishment of uniform labor standards, and to provide for the general welfare, by removing the obstacles which prevent the organization of labor for the purpose of cooperative action in maintaining its standards of living, by encouraging the equalization of the bargaining power of employers and employees, and by providing agencies for the peaceful settlement of disputes.

SEC. 3. When used in this Act—

(1) The term "person" includes individual, partnership, association, corporation, and the legal representative, trustee in bankruptcy, receiver, or trustee thereof, or the legal representative of a deceased person.

(2) The term "employer" means a person who has one or more employees, except that the term "employer" shall not include the United States, or any State, municipal corporation, or other governmental instrumentality, or any person subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or any labor organization, or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.

(5) The term "labor organization" means any organization, labor union, association, corporation, or society of any kind in which employees participate to any degree whatsoever, which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, or hours of employment.

(6) The term "commerce" means trade or commerce, or any transportation or communication relating thereto, among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

(7) The term "unfair labor practice" means any unfair labor practice listed in section 5.

(8) The term "National Labor Board" means the National Labor Board created by section 201 of this Act.

SEC. 4. Employees shall have the right to organize and join labor organizations, and to engage in concerted activities, either in labor organizations or otherwise, for the purposes of organizing and bargaining collectively through representatives of their own choosing or for other purposes of mutual aid or protection.

SEC. 5. It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer, or anyone acting in his interest, directly or indirectly—

(1) To attempt, by interference, influence, restraint, favor, coercion, or lockout, or by any other means, to impair the right of employees guaranteed in section 4.

(2) To refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees, or to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

(3) To initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, bylaws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization.

(4) To contribute financial or other material support to any labor organization, by compensating anyone for services performed in behalf of any labor organization, or by any other means whatsoever.

tions of employment shall not, because of anything contained in this paragraph, compel an employer to observe similar conditions of employment in his relations with all his employees: Provided further, That nothing in this Act shall preclude an employer and a labor organization from agreeing that a person seeking employment shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join such labor organization, if no attempt is made to influence such labor organization by any unfair labor practice, if such labor organization is composed of at least a majority of such employers' employees, and if the said agreement does not cover a period in excess of one year.

SEC. 6. The several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain any unfair labor practice that burdens or affects commerce or obstructs the free flow of commerce, or has led or tends to lead to a labor dispute that might affect or burden commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce, and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, but solely at the request of the National Labor Board, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain any such unfair labor practices.

TITLE II

SECTION 201. There is hereby created a Board, to be known as the "National Labor Board" (hereinafter referred to as the "Board"), which shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Two of such members shall, at the time of nomination, be designated as representatives of employers, two as representatives of employees, and three as representatives of the general public. The members representing the general public shall be appointed for terms of five years each, and the other members shall be appointed for terms of one year each, and all members shall be eligible for reappointment. Any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one of the members representing the general public as chairman of the Board. No member representing the general public shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. A vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Board. The Board shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

SEC. 202. (a) Each member representing the general public shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. The other members shall each receive $25 per diem and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses when attending meetings of the Board. The Board shall appoint and fix the compensation of an executive secretary, and it shall have authority to appoint and fix the compensation of such attorneys, special experts, examiners, mediators, clerks, and other employees, and to establish such regional or local boards, as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress. The Board may make such appointments without regard to the civil service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The Board is directed to retain the officers and employees of the National Labor Board created by the President on August 5, 1933, to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient functioning of the Board.

(b) All the expenses of the Board, including all necessary traveling expenses outside the District of Columbia incurred by the members or employees of the Board under its orders, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the Board or by any individual it designates for that purpose.

SEC. 203. The principal office of the Board shall be in the District of Columbia, but it may meet and exercise all its powers at any other place. The Board may, by one or more of its members or by such employees as it may designate, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties in any part of the United States. A member who participates in such an inquiry shall not be disqualified from subsequently participating in a decision of the Board in the same case.

SEC. 204. The Board may, either by itself or through its agents, offer its services to the parties to any labor dispute as conciliator or mediator in such dispute, and may act as conciliator or mediator for the parties who accept such offer.

SEC. 205. (a) The Board is empowered to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice that burdens or affects commerce or obstructs the free flow of commerce, or has led or tends to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

(b) Whenever any member of the Board, or the executive secretary, or any person designated for such purpose by the Board, shall have reason to believe, from information acquired from any source whatsoever, that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, he shall in his discretion issue and cause to be served upon such person a complaint stating the general nature of the charges in that respect, and containing a notice of hearing before either an examiner or the Board at a place therein fixed, not less than twenty-four hours after the service of said complaint, but the examiner or the Board shall have discretion to continue or adjourn such hearing from time to time. Any such complaint may be amended by any member of the Board or by any person designated for that purpose by the Board at any time prior to the issuance of an order based thereon; and the original complaint shall not be regarded as limiting the scope of the inquiry. The person so complained of shall have the right to file an answer, to appear and give testimony at the place and time fixed in the complaint, and to avail himself of the compulsory process of the Board in summoning witnesses in his behalf. In the discretion of the examiner or the Board, any other person shall be allowed to appear in the said proceeding by counsel or in person to present testimony. In any such proceeding, the examiner or the Board shall not be bound by the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity.

(c) The testimony taken by an examiner or the Board shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the executive secretary. Thereafter, in its discretion, the Board may itself take further testimony and/or hear argument. If upon all the testimony taken, the Board shall be of the opinion that any person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue an appropriate order directed to such person. The order may require such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, or to take affirmative action, or to pay damages, or to reinstate employees, or to perform any other acts that will achieve substantial justice under the circumstances. Such order may further require such person to make a report from time to time showing the extent to which he has complied with the order. Until a transcript of the record in a case shall have been filed in a court, as hereinafter provided, the Board may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any finding or order made or issued by it.

(d) If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may petition any district court of the United States within any district wherein the labor practice in question was engaged in or wherein such person resides or carries on business, or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, for the enforcement of the order of the Board, and shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which such order was entered, together with a copy of the findings and the order of the Board. Upon such filing of the petition and transcript, the court shall place such petition upon its motion or equity calendar and shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to make and enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Board. No objection to the order of the Board shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before the Board. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Board, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Board may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, and shall file its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order. The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree, affirming, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, any order of the Board, shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate Circuit Court of Appeals or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347). The commencement of proceedings under this subsection shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Board's order.

(e) Any person aggrieved by an order of the Board may obtain a review of such order in any district court of the United States in the district wherein the unfair labor practice in question was engaged in or wherein such person resides or carries on business, or in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court, within ten days after the entry of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Board be modified or be set aside in whole or in part. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Board, and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court a transcript of the record, certified by the Board, upon which the order complained of was entered, together with a copy of the findings and order of the Board. No objection to the order of the Board shall be considered by the court unless such objections shall have been urged before the Board. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Board, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The commencement of proceedings under this subsection shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Board's order.

(f) No court shall have any jurisdiction to enjoin the Board or an examiner from taking action or holding hearings under a complaint.

(g) Petitions filed under this Act shall be heard expeditiously, and if possible within ten days after they have been docketed.

(h) Complaints, orders, and other process of the Board and its agents may be served by anyone duly authorized by the Board, either (1) by delivering a copy thereof to the person to be served, or to a member of the partnership to be served, or to the president, secretary, or other executive officer, or a director of the corporation to be served; or (2) by leaving a copy thereof at the principal office or place of business of such person, partnership, or corporation; or (3) by registering and mailing a copy thereof addressed to such person, partnership, or corporation at his or its principal office or place of business; or (4) by sending a telegraphic copy thereof addressed to such person, partnership, or corporation at his or its principal office or place of business. The verified return by the person so serving said complaint, order, or other process setting forth the manner of said service shall be proof of the same, and the return post office receipt or telegraph receipt for said complaint, order, or other process registered and mailed or telegraphed as aforesaid shall be proof of the service of the same.

SEC. 206. (a) The Board shall have power to act as arbitrator in labor disputes. When any of the parties to a labor dispute agree to submit the whole or any part thereof to the arbitration of the Board, and the Board accepts such submission, the agreement shall be valid, irrevocable, and enforceable as to the submitting parties save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract. In any case accepted by it for arbitration the Board shall have power to issue an award applicable to the submitting parties.

(b) Unless a party to the arbitration has otherwise stipulated at the time of the submission of the case to the Board, any party to the arbitration, or the Board itself, may within one month after the award is made, apply to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for an order confirming the award, and thereupon the court shall grant such an order unless the award is vacated, modified, or corrected as hereinafter prescribed. Notice of the application shall be served upon the other parties to the arbitration by the marshal of any district within which they may be found, in like manner as any other process of such court, and thereupon such court shall have jurisdiction of such parties as though they had appeared generally in the proceeding.

(c) The court may make an order vacating the award upon the application of any party to the arbitration if the Board exceeded its powers or executed them so imperfectly that a mutual and definite award upon the subject matter was not made. The court may make an order modifying or correcting the award upon the application of any party to the arbitration if (1) the award covers a matter not submitted to the Board (unless the award upon such matter does not affect the merits of the decision upon the matter submitted) or (2) the award is imperfect in matter of form not affecting the merits of the controversy. The order may modify or correct the award so as to effect the intention thereof and promote justice between the parties. A party to the arbitration, claiming to be aggrieved by the award, may apply to the court, within one week after the award is made, for an order vacating, modifying, or correcting the award. Notice of such application shall be served upon all other parties to the arbitration proceeding or their attorneys, by the marshals of the respective districts within which such parties may be found. For the purposes of the application, any judge who might make an order to stay the proceedings in any action brought in the same court may make an order, to be served with the notice of the application, staying the enforcement of the award.

the parties, in writing, the name or names of the individuals or labor organizations that have been designated and authorized to represent employees. In any such investigation, the Board shall be authorized to take a secret ballot of employees, or to utilize any other appropriate method to ascertain their representatives. The Board shall decide whether eligibility to participate in elections shall be determined on the basis of employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other appropriate grouping.

(b) In any dispute not of the character described in subsection (a), as to who are the representatives of employees, the Board may offer its services to aid in determining who are employees' representatives.

SEC. 208. For the purpose of all hearings and investigations, which, in the opinion of the Board, are necessary and proper for the exercise of the powers vested in it by sections 205 and 207 (a)—

(1) Any member of the Board, or any agent designated by it for such purposes, is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, take depositions, subpena witnesses, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, or other documents which the Board deems relevant or material to the inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory or possession thereof, at any designated place of hearing.

(2) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person, any district court of the United States, the United States courts of any Territory or possession, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides, upon application by the Board, shall issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Board, or an examiner designated by it, there to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

(3) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, contracts, agreements, and other documents before the Board, or in obedience to the subpena of the Board or any member thereof or any agent designated by it, or in any cause, proceeding, or investigation instituted by the Board, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him, may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

(4) Witnesses summoned before the Board or any of its examiners shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

(5) The several departments and agencies of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the Board, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any matter before the Board.

SEC. 209. The Board shall have authority from time to time to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Such rules and regulations shall be effective upon publication in the manner which the Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 210. Any person who shall willfully assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any member of the Board or any of its agents in the performance of his duties pursuant to section 205 or section 207(a), shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

TITLE III

SECTION 301. There is hereby created in the Department of Labor the United States Conciliation Service, under the direction of a Director of Conciliation. The Secretary of Labor shall appoint and fix the compensation of such Director, and shall have authority to appoint and fix the compensation of such commissioners of conciliation, clerks, and other officers and employees as he may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of the duties of the Service, and as may from time to time be appropriated for by Congress. The Secretary of Labor may make such appointments without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 302. It shall be the duty of the United States Conciliation Service, whenever the Director deems it desirable, to offer its services to the parties to any labor dispute, and to attempt to adjust such dispute by conciliation or mediation, or by arranging for voluntary arbitration. Nothing in this title shall limit the power given to the Secretary of Labor under section 8 of the Act of March 4, 1913 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 619).

SEC. 303. Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

SEC. 304. (a) Wherever the application of the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and/or of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes", approved March 23, 1932 (U.S.C., title 29, secs. 101–115), conflicts with the application of the provisions of this Act, the provisions of this Act shall prevail: Provided, That in any situation where the provisions of this Act cannot be validly enforced, the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and/or of such Act of March 23, 1932, shall apply.

(b) Any term of a contract or agreement of any kind which conflicts with the provisions of this Act is hereby abrogated, and every employer who is a party to such contract or agreement shall immediately so notify his employees by appropriate action.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, SENATE—MARCH 1, 1934
(78 Cong. Rec. 3443)

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL RECOVERY ACT—NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill and to make a brief statement in explanation of it.

The bill which I am introducing is designed to clarify and fortify the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and to provide means of administering them through the legislative establishment of a national labor board with adequate enforcement powers.

The keynote of the recovery program is organization and cooperation. Employers are allowed to unite in trade associations in order to pool their information and experience and make a concerted drive upon the problems of modern industrialism. If properly directed, this united strength will result in unalloyed good to the Nation. But it is fraught with great danger to workers and consumers if it is not counterbalanced by the equal organization and equal bargaining power of employees. Such equality is the central need of the economic world today. It is necessary to insure a wise distribution of wealth between management and labor, to maintain a full flow of purchasing power, and to prevent recurrent depressions.

Genuine collective bargaining is the only way to attain equality of bargaining power. By section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, Congress attempted to open the avenues to collective bargaining by restating the right of employees to act through representatives of their own choosing, free from the influence of employers. But section 7 (a) did not outlaw the specific practices by which some employers set up insuperable obstacles to genuine collective bargaining.

The greatest obstacles to collective bargaining are employer-dominated unions, which have multiplied with amazing rapidity since the enactment of the recovery law. Such a union makes a sham of equal bargaining power by restricting employee cooperation to a single employer unit at a time when business men are allowed to band together in large groups. It deprives workers of the wider cooperation which is necessary, not only to uphold their own end of the labor bargain but to stabilize and standardize wage levels, to cope with the sweatshop and the exploiter, and to exercise their proper voice in economic affairs.

Under the employer-dominated union, the worker, who cannot select an outside representative to bargain for him, suffers two fatal handicaps. In the first place, he has only slight knowledge of the labor market, or of general business conditions. His trade is tending a machine. If forbidden to hire an expert in industrial relationships, he is entirely ineffectual in his attempts to take advantage of legitimate opportunities.

No one would suggest that employers should not be allowed to employ outside lawyers, financial experts, or advisers. Secondly, only representatives who are not subservient to the employer with whom they deal can act freely in the interest of employees. Simple, common sense tells us that a man does not possess this freedom when he bargains with those who control his source of livelihood.

For these reasons the very first step toward genuine collective bargaining is the abolition of the employer-dominated union as an agency for dealing with grievances, labor disputes, wages, rules, or hours of employment.

The bill which I am introducing today forbids any employer to foster or participate in or influence any organization which deals with problems that should be covered by a genuine labor union. At the same time it does not prevent employers from forming or assisting associations which exist to promote the health or general welfare of workers, to provide group insurance, or for other similar purposes. Employer-controlled organizations should be allowed to serve their proper function of supplementing trade unionism, but they should not be allowed to supplant or destroy it.

Failure to meet the problem of employer domination over employee organizations has not been the only defect of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. This section provides that employees shall be free to choose their own representatives. It has been interpreted repeatedly to mean that any employee at any time may choose his own representative or may elect to deal individually with his employer. Such an interpretation, which illegalizes the closed union shop, strikes a death blow at the practice and theory of collective bargaining. It allows the unscrupulous employer to divide the workers against themselves. No real advocate of collective bargaining would argue that a worker should be free to bargain individually even after the overwhelming majority of his coworkers desire an agreement covering all.

The new legislation which I am proposing does not dictate any policy as to the closed union shop. That is a problem which labor must work out for itself. But the bill does make it clear that section 7 (a) was not intended to ban the closed union shop, and that Congress never intended to place employees in a worse position then they were before the Recovery Act was passed.

The third major defect of section 7 (a) is that it guarantees employees the right to organize, but not the right to recognition. My 6 months' experience as chairman of the National Labor Board has proved conclusively to me that the second guaranty should be firmly established by Congress. Over 70 percent of the disputes coming before the Labor Board have been caused by the refusal of employers to deal with representatives chosen by their workers.

The new bill, if enacted into law, will remedy this evil. It is modeled upon the successful experience of the Railway Labor Act, which provides that employers shall actually recognize duly chosen representatives and make a reasonable effort to deal with them and to reach satisfactory collective agreements.

The new bill sets up a permanent National Labor Board, with 2 representatives of employers, 2 of employees, and 3 of the general public; and there are provisions for the establishment of regional or local boards. The board will have power to prevent violations of the substantive features of the law by restraining orders, enforced through the courts in the same manner as the orders of the Federal Trade Commission.

In addition, the National Labor Board is given the powers of subpena and investigation necessary for the proper exercise of its various functions.

The National Labor Board, under the new legislation, is not designed to act chiefly as a policeman or a judge. Its [3444] chief function will be to mediate and conciliate industrial disputes, and to offer its services as an arbitrator whenever the parties so desire. It will continue to promote peace rather than strife, and to appeal primarily to the better judgment and good intentions of industry and labor. My experience as chairman of the National Labor Board has confirmed my belief that most employers and employees desire to obey the law. But safeguards must be set up against the devastating effects of unfair minorities who force almost all to follow similar tactics.

The recovery program has achieved remarkable results in increasing employment, swelling the volume of industrial activity, and promoting confidence. It has made relatively slow progress in affecting that fair distribution of purchasing power upon which permanent prosperity must rest. Today, despite the minimum-wage provisions of the codes, the purchasing power of the individual employee working full time is less than it was during March of last year. This situation cannot be remedied by new codes or by general exhortations. It can be remedied only when there is genuine cooperation between employers and employees, on a basis of equal bargaining power. The only road to this goal is the free and unhampered development of real employee organizations and their complete recognition. Such development was promised by the Recovery Act. It should be guaranteed by enactment of the new legislation which is being proposed today.

Mr. President, I desire to state that this proposed legislation reflects only my own views. It does not reflect the views of the National Labor Board, because I have not submitted the bill to that Board for consideration, nor does it reflect the views of any other public official.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2926) to equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees, to create a National Labor Board, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WAGNER subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning I introduced a bill upon which I made a short statement explanatory of its provisions. I ask unanimous consent that in conjunction with my remarks the bill may be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, SENATE—MARCH 5, 1934

(78 Cong. Rec. 3678)

N. R. A. CODES—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WAGNER

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered today by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. Wagner] at the conference of code authorities in the city of Washington.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

This representative gathering symbolizes the spirit of cooperation and the desire for action that have animated the entire Nation during the past year. The dynamic personality and capacity for leadership of President Roosevelt have struck a responsive chord in the hearts of his countrymen. If I were asked to designate the greatest single accomplishment of the recovery program, I should not refer to revived industrial activity or to reemployment, important though these are. What is new is the philosophy that we are not the helpless victims of natural law, but are able to control our own destinies and provide for our future welfare and prosperity.

You are all familiar with the wealth of statistical evidence that economic recovery is assured. The index of basic industrial output is 30 percent higher than a year ago. During the past 2 months there have been more favorable changes in dividend payments than in any equal period of time since the depression began. Freightcar loadings, residential construction, the automobile industry, electric-power production, and coal and steel operations all tell the same story of rapid progress.

The time has come to ask: Where are we progressing? Are we content to return to the uneven prosperity of the nineteen twenties, with its poverty, its uncertainty, and its seeds of recurrent depressions? Or are we prepared to lay the solid foundations for a saner and happier mode of economic life?

Since the turn of the century this country has been prolific in the production of goods. Wealth has poured forth from factory and mine and field in unequaled abundance. If our social organization had kept pace with our mechanical inventiveness, the paradox of progress and poverty would have vanished completely. Instead, the paradox has become more glaring. No one with a sense of economic realities would attempt to explain this incongruity by a single formula. But patient and careful students, working independently of one another, have almost all arrived at a major agreement. This is that the distribution of income among the masses of our people has not been sufficient to absorb industrial output. Purchasing power has been dried up at the source, with inevitable reactions upon business and upon the entire economic structure.

I bring to the forefront the problem of coordinating production and wages because here lies the most significant economic challenge which faces us. Everyone recognizes this, and everyone admits that upon a satisfactory solution depends the welfare of all groups.

To this task, the entire Recovery Administration, under the extraordinary leadership of General Johnson, have devoted themselves with rare understanding. They have blazed a new trail, and the obstacles have been manifold. It is because they have achieved such splendid results that it is now appropriate to consider the program for the future.

The increase in the real income of the entire wage-earning class has been due to reemployment rather than to improved individual standards. The individual worker employed full time is earning less today than he did last March, and his welfare is still further imperiled by the rising of all price levels in response to our monetary policy.

It is therefore essential that most of the code provisions affecting wages should be revised drastically. Some of the minimum standards set by the codes are lower than those actually prevailing in industry. In the upper wage brackets, there have been reductions in hours without corresponding increases in wage rates per hour. As a result, there has been some tendency for the wage [3679] rises in the lower brackets to be counteracted by reductions in the upper ones. This is a serious evil, for prosperity can neither be attained nor preserved by making workers share with workers.

If we intend to achieve the fundamental reforms of the new deal, we must be careful not to stop short even when wages reach a volume that is sufficient to keep factories open. Under a controlled economy, it would be perfectly possible to balance production and consumption, and still keep workers in poverty. Our efforts should be directed, first toward providing the worker with an income sufficient for comfortable living, and then toward assuring him an equitable share in our national wealth. I believe that to accomplish this there must be considerable change of emphasis in connection with the setting of minimum wages under the codes.

The same considerations apply to the regulation of working hours. Most of the scales under the codes are far too high, even by the narrow test of emergency measures. The Recovery Act, by establishing an average week of 38 hours, has destroyed the slavery of the sweatshop, but it has not reduced hours enough to provide for the 10,000,000 people who have not been reabsorbed by industry. Of these people, only 4,000,000 are being employed by public projects; 6,000,000 remain in desperate need.

It is a mistake to regard the shorter-hour movement simply as a means of spreading work or to criticize it as a lowering of productive efficiency which necessarily would tend to reduce all standards of living. Our technological skills have advanced so greatly during the present century that we can produce more than ever before even while lightening the burden upon the back of labor. During 1919–29 our manufacturing output rose 50 percent despite an actual decline in the number of workers engaged. During this so-called "prosperity era" we had over 3,000,000 unemployed, because we tried to appropriate too large a share of progress to a few in the form of profits and not enough to the many in the form of shorter hours. We apologetically referred to technological unemployment, when in truth we were suffering from refusal to confer the benefits of technology upon workers as well as owners. The shorter week should become a permanent part of our prosperity program. If not, the dead weight of the unemployed will drag us continually into the mire.

This analysis indicates the need for a constant process of wise adjustments between industry and labor. We have reached the period where there must be a gradual transition from an emergency basis to a permanent basis. Permanent problems cannot be solved simply by reopening codes or by general exhortations, although both of these devices may be necessary at the present time. There must be above all cooperation between employers and employees, dealing with one another on an equal footing. Our great leader, President Roosevelt, has been tireless in his advocacy of this ideal.

The first step involved in cooperation between employers and employees is that they should settle their disputes amicably and profitably, without resort to the bitter and indecisive strife of the past. The National Labor Board, of which I have served as chairman for 6 months, has handled disputes involving over 900,000 workers. Of these, over 650,000 have been put back to work or kept at work with high promise of durable peace. This figure does not include the additional thousands who have been aided by the quiet, unspectacular work of the regional labor boards in all parts of the country. The universal esteem in which the members of the Board are held and the unanimity of most of their decisions have gained the confidence of the Nation.

It is certain that almost everyone interested in economic welfare desires the permanent establishment of this Board by Congress. To that end, I have introduced a bill on March 1, and Representative CONNERY has introduced a similar measure in the House. The bill provides for a board of 7 members, with 2 representing employers, 2 employees, and 3 the general public. Provisions are made for the establishment of regional or local boards.

However, the experience of everyone connected with the National Labor Board has shown that no board alone can promote cooperation and industrial peace unless the basic conditions exist upon which peace and cooperation must rest. Section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act sought to establish these basic conditions. But the ambiguity of some of its terms, and the inadequacy of enforcement power, have enabled a minority to flaunt the law and endanger the entire recovery drive. The appeal for the clarification and fortification of section 7 (a) has intensified recently, and has received response in the new legislation proposed last week.

The primary requirement for cooperation is that employers and employees should possess equality of bargaining power. The only way to accomplish this is by securing for employees the full right to act collectively through representatives of their own choosing. The principle of collective bargaining has been attacked as a violation of the constitutional guaranty of freedom of contract, since it does not preserve for each employer the right to make contracts with each of his employees as individuals. Nothing could be more fallacious. The fathers of our Nation did not regard freedom of contract as an abstract end. They valued it as a means of insuring equal opportunities, which cannot be attained where contracts are dictated by the stronger party.

The law has long refused to recognize contracts secured through physical compulsion or duress. The actualities of present-day life impel us to recognize economic duress as well. We are forced to recognize the futility of pretending that there is equality of freedom when a single workman, with only his job between his family and ruin, sits down to draw a contract of employment with a representative of a tremendous organization having thousands of workers at its call. Thus the right to bargain collectively, guaranteed to labor by section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, is a veritable charter of freedom of contract; without it there would be slavery by contract.

Since the passage of the Recovery Act, the freedom of workers to engage in genuine collective bargaining has been hampered enormously by the growth of the employer-dominated union. The number of employees covered by such unions rose from 432,000 in 1932 to 1,164,000 in 1933, representing a gain of 169 percent. Over 69 percent of the employer-dominated unions now in existence have been inaugurated in the brief period since the passage of the Recovery Act.

I can see no objection to the so-called "company union", if by that term one means simply a union which is not affiliated with any other organization, and whose members all work for the same employer. But I do oppose the domination of such unions by employers who do not permit their workers to become affiliated with outside organizations even when they desire to do so. In many cases such wider cooperation is necessary to stabilize and standardize wage levels, to cope with the sweatshop and the exploiter, and to combat the employer who is unfair and overweening. Moreover, it is an absolute essential to real collective bargaining that employees should have the right to be represented by independent experts who have a knowledge of business conditions and who are not subject to the economic sway of the employer with whom they deal.

Many of the employer-dominated unions, I am well aware, have amended their rules so as to recognize these outside representatives. But the privilege granted to employees is a barren one if, on the whole, they are dominated by the employer-controlled organization. In truth, the very fact that the grant comes through employer consent is a travesty upon workers' rights.

The bill which I have introduced forbids employers to engage in specific practices whereby they exercise undue control over employee organizations. At the same time, it does not prevent employers from participating in schemes to promote the general welfare of their workers. Employer organizations should be encouraged to serve their proper function of supplementing trade unions, but they should not be allowed to supplant or destroy them.

Another defect of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act is that it guarantees the right of employees to organize, but does not expressly secure to their representatives the right of recognition. Over 70 percent of the cases before the National Labor Board have resulted from the failure of employers to follow the clear intent of the law. The new bill, modeled after the successful experience of the Railway Labor Act, requires fair efforts to bargain collectively and genuine attempts to arrive at satisfactory agreements.

I believe that most fair-minded employers, when they have occasion to study the provisions of the proposed legislation, will be heartily in favor of it. Fair-minded men who are now allowed to band together in large trade associations do not desire to deny analogous rights to their workers. Fair-minded men do not take kindly to the pretense that industry and labor are cooperating if, in fact, one side controls both parties by holding the strings. Most important, far-sighted, broad-minded employers, who see the threat to industrial peace and economic security implicit in the present state of affairs, will enter whole-heartedly into this plan for improvement.

The new bill empowers the Board to issue restraining orders, enforceable in the courts, against the unfair minorities whose devastating tactics force well-intentioned parties to follow the same course. But the most important function of the new Board, as of the present one, would be the peaceful and voluntary conciliation of industrial disputes. The measure does not have the slightest flavor of compulsory arbitration. It relies upon the good will, common sense, and public spirit of the interested parties. It presents, in my opinion, the best solution to the thorniest problem confronting us all at the present time. When enacted it will remove the chief obstacle to economic recovery and industrial peace, and I earnestly hope that it will win the support of everyone.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, SENATE—MARCH 12, 1934

(78 Cong. Rec. 4229)

COMPANY UNIONS—ARTICLE BY SENATOR WAGNER

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article by my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] on company unions, appearing in the New York Times of Sunday, March 11, may be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 11, 1934]

COMPANY UNIONS: A VAST INDUSTRIAL ISSUE—SENATOR WAGNER SETS FORTH THE GROWTH OF EMPLOYER-DOMINATED ORGANIZATIONS, TELLS OF THEIR EFFECT ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING, AND DISCUSSES HIS BILL, WHICH IS DESIGNED TO PREVENT ECONOMIC WARFARE

(The company union has become a focal point in the industrial-relations problem that confronts the Nation. It was under vigorous debate during the N. R. A. hearings last week and it is dealt with in a bill designed to eliminate strife between labor and industry, introduced in Congress by Senator WAGNER, who has served as Chairman of the National Labor Board since that body came into existence. The subject, together with other phases of the problem, is discussed in the following article.)

By ROBERT F. WAGNER, Senator from New York

Despite the emergency language in which it is cloaked, the recovery program embodies principles of reform as well as revival. The statistical indicia of revival are not to be denied, but the need for reform is still acute. And there is substantial agreement as to the path that reform must take if we are to achieve any approximation to social justice and avoid the recurrence of cataclysmic depressions. The fruits of industry must be distributed more bounteously among the masses of wage earners, who create the bulk of consumer demand.

This central problem has been envisaged by the National Recovery Administration, led by General Johnson and ever subject to the dynamic personality and brilliant intelligence of President Roosevelt. But, despite their best efforts, the major portion of the problem remains unsolved. While reemployment has swelled the total volume of wage payments, the real earnings of the individual working full time are slightly less than they were last March.

[4230] Some of the minimum-wage provisions under the codes are lower than the standards actually prevailing in industry and in most of the upper wage brackets there have been reductions in hours without corresponding rises in hourly rates of pay. Despite the ameliorative features of a share-the-work movement, it is hardly the road to prosperity.

NEED OF EQUALITY

The reasons for the present difficulty are not hidden. The constant readjustments necessary to strike a fair balance between industry and labor cannot be accomplished simply by code revisions or by general exhortations. They can be accomplished only by cooperation between employers and employees, which rests upon equality of bargaining power and the freedom of either party from restraints imposed by the other.

Congress recognized this when it enacted section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, restating the right of employees to deal collectively through representatives of their own choosing. But ambiguities of language and the absence of enforcement powers have enabled a minority of employers to deviate from the clear intent of the law and to threaten our entire program with destruction. Therefore I have introduced a bill to clarify and fortify the provisions of section 7 (a), and I am sure that it will meet with the support of the vast majority of people interested in economic welfare.

COMPANY UNIONS

At the present time genuine collective bargaining is being thwarted immeasurably by the proliferation of company unions. Let me state at the outset that by the term "company union" I do not refer to all independent labor organizations whose membership lists embrace only the employees of a single employer. I allude rather to the employer-dominated union, generally initiated by the employer, which arbitrarily restricts employee cooperation to a single employer unit, and which habitually allows workers to deal with their employer only through representatives chosen from among his employees.

In the fall of 1933 a thoroughly reliable study was made which covered more than one fourth of the total number of wage earners engaged in mining and manufacturing. An inquiry of this magnitude may be accepted as a fair sample of conditions in industry at large. It showed that only 9.3 percent of employees are dealing with employers through trade-unions, while 45.7 percent are bargaining on an individual basis and 45 percent are enlisted in company unions. Less than 14 percent of the employers embraced by the study are recognized trade-unions.

HAMPERING CONDITIONS

It is worthy of note that company unions are most prevalent in the largest plants. This means that in the very cases where the bargaining power of the employer is strongest the worker is least free to improve his own position by unhampered affiliation with others of his kind.

It is also true that these unions have multiplied most rapidly since the enactment of the law which was intended to guarantee to the worker the fullest freedom of organization. The number of employees covered by company unions rose from 432,000 in 1932 to 1,164,000 in 1933, representing a gain of 169 percent. More than 69 percent of the company-union schemes now in existence have been inaugurated in the brief period since the passage of the Recovery Act.

The company union, as I have defined it, runs antithetical to the very core of the new-deal philosophy. Business men are being allowed to pool their information and experience in vast trade associations in order to make a concerted drive against the evil features of modern industrialism. They have been permitted to recognize the values of unity and the destructive tendencies of discrete activities and to act accordingly. If employees are denied similar privileges, they not only are unable to uphold their end of the labor bargain; in addition they cannot cope with any problems that transcend the boundaries of a single business.

BENEFITS AND FAILINGS

The company union has improved personal relations, group-welfare activities, discipline, and the other matters which may be handled on a local basis. But it has failed dismally to standardize or improve wage levels, for the wage question is a general one whose sweep embraces whole industries, or States, or even the Nation. Without wider areas of cooperation among employees there can be no protection against the nibbling tactics of the unfair employer or of the worker who is willing to degrade standards by serving for a pittance.

The inability of employees to unite in larger groups has not only limited their efforts to secure a just share of the national wealth. It has interfered with their attempts to provide insurance against sickness and old age and to exert an effective influence upon salutary labor legislation. It has hampered the efforts of labor to preserve order within its own ranks or to restrain the untimely and wayward acts of irresponsible groups. In this latter aspect its unfavorable effect upon employers as well as workers stands clearly forth.

Even when dealing with problems that may without injury be delimited to the single company, the worker under company unionism suffers two fatal handicaps. In the first place, he has only slight knowledge of the labor market or of general business conditions. His trade is tending a machine. If forbidden to hire an expert in industrial relationships, he is entirely ineffectual in his attempts to take advantage of legitimate opportunities.

Secondly, only representatives who are not subservient to the employer with whom they deal can act freely in the interest of employees. Simple common sense tells us that a man does not possess this freedom when he bargains with those who control his source of livelihood.

I am well aware that many employer-dominated organizations now permit their employees to choose outside representatives, and the National Labor Board has affirmed this policy in a recent case. But this right is a mockery when the presence of a company union firmly entrenched in a plant enables an employer to exercise a compelling force over the collective activities of his workers. Freedom must begin with the removal of obstacles to its exercise.

MAJOR QUESTIONS INVOLVED

Major questions of self-expression and democracy are involved. At a time when politics is becoming impersonalized and when the average worker is remote from the processes of government, it is more imperative than ever before that industry should afford him real opportunities to participate in the determination of economic issues.

The company union is generally initiated by the employer; it exists by his sufferance; its decisions are subject to his unimpeachable veto. Most impartial students of industrial problems agree that the highest degree of cooperation between industry and labor is possible only when either side is free to act or to withdraw, and that the best records of mutual respect and mutual accomplishment have been made by employers dealing with independent labor organizations.

THE COMPANY'S CASE

The principal argument advanced by the proponents of company unionism is that it promotes industrial harmony and peace without subjecting the individual company to the intrusion of outside labor groups who have no interest in the company's practices. Of course, in our complicated economy the interests of all employers and all employees are inextricably intertwined, and the assumption that outside workers have no valid interest in the labor standards prevailing within a plant is demonstrably false. Besides, a tranquil relationship between employer and employee, while eminently desirable, is not a sole desideratum. It all depends upon the basis of tranquillity. The slave system of the old South was as tranquil as a summer's day, but that is no reason for perpetuating in modern industry any of the aspects of a master-servant relationship.

As a matter of fact, the company union cannot sustain even the claim that it tends to insure industrial peace. Men versed in the tenets of freedom become restive when not allowed to be free. The sharp outbreaks of economic warfare in various parts of the country at the present time have been caused more by the failure of employers to observe the spirit of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act than by any other single factor. It has been my observation that industrial strife is most violent when company unionism enters into the situation, and that the company union line of organization is least likely to bring forth the restraint of irresponsible employees by others of their own group.

The implications of what I have just said are clear. If the employer-dominated union is not checked, there are only two likely results. One is that the employer will have to maintain his dominance by force, and thus swing us directly into industrial fascism and the destruction of our most-cherished American ideals; the other is that employees will revolt, with wide-spread violence and unpredictable conclusions.

The final argument advanced for company unionism is that it should be allowed to compete against trade unionism in an open field. If by company unionism one means simply the right of employees to confine their activities to a single employer unit when they wish to do so, I do not object to that principle in the slightest, and there is nothing contrary to it in the bill which I have introduced. But if by company unionism one includes the right of employers to obstruct the development of a more widespread employee cooperation, such a policy cannot be allowed to continue if we intend to pursue the philosophy of the new era.

THE NEW BILL

The new bill forbids any employer to influence any organization which deals with problems such as wages, grievances, and hours. They should be covered by a genuine labor union. At the same time, the bill does not prevent employers from forming or assisting associations which exist to promote the health and general welfare of workers or to provide group insurance, or for similar purposes. Employer-controlled organizations should be allowed to serve their proper functions of supplementing trade unionism, but they should not be allowed to supplant or destroy it.

Failure to meet the company-union challenge has not been the only defect of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. This section provides that employees shall be free to choose their own representatives. It has been interpreted repeatedly to mean that any employee at any time may elect to deal individually with his employer, even if the overwhelming majority of his coworkers desire a collective agreement covering all. Such an interpretation is detrimental to the practice and contrary to the theory of collective bargaining. It permits an unscrupulous employer to divide his employees against themselves by dealing with innumerable small groups or with individuals.

In my opinion, Congress certainly did not intend that the law should operate to place employees in a more unfavorable position than they were before the Recovery Act was passed.

The proposed legislation does not resolve the question of the closed-union shop. Such issues should be worked out by labor and industry in the course of experience. But the bill, if enacted, would make it clear that Congress has not intended to foreclose [4231] the issue by illegalizing the closed-union shop or by placing any other obstacles in the way of making collective bargaining a working reality.

QUESTION OF RECOGNITION

The third major defect of section 7 (a) is that while it guarantees to employees the right to organize, it does not state explicitly the right to receive recognition through their representatives. This explains why company unionism has increased so rapidly despite the fact that other labor organizations have added 2,000,000 to their membership during the past year. Employees have been assured of their right to join whatever unions they prefer, but they have been forced to bargain either individually or through company unions.

This refusal of employers to deal with properly chosen representatives has been the cause of more than 70 percent of the disputes coming before the National Labor Board. The new bill is designed to remedy this evil. It is modeled upon the successful experience of the Railway Labor Act, which provides that employers shall actually recognize duly chosen representatives and make a reasonable effort to deal with them and to reach satisfactory collective agreements.

ATTITUDE OF EMPLOYERS

When the factual situation that confronts us is analyzed carefully and comprehended fully, I am sure that employers as well as employees will favor the proposed measure. Fair-minded employers who are now allowed to band together in huge trade associations do not desire to deny analogous rights to their workers. Fair-minded employers do not relish the pretense that industry and labor are upon an equal footing, when, in fact, industry controls both sides by dominating the strategic points in the areas of controversy.

Most important of all, far-sighted and broad-visioned employers who recognize the certainty of economic discord and the threat to our entire economic program that is implicit in the present status of labor relations will join whole-heartedly in this proposal for improvement.

There always will be an unfair minority who are amenable only to coercion. For this reason the National Labor Board, under the new bill, would be vested with statutory sanctions and given actual powers of investigation and restraint similar to those exercised by the Federal Trade Commission in cases of unfair competition. It would be composed of 7 members, including 2 representatives of employers, 2 of employees, and 3 of the general public, and it would be empowered to set up regional or local boards.

FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD

The present National Labor Board, set up by Executive order, has carried on its activities for half a year. In that short time it has helped 650,000 employees, who were engaged in disputes, to return to work or to remain at work, upon terms satisfactory to all interested parties and promising durable peace. The chief function of the new board would not be to act as policeman or judge but to mediate and conciliate industrial disputes and to offer its services as arbitrator when the parties so desired. Aside from its power to prevent the specific unfair practices that would be forbidden by the law, it would not have the slightest flavor of compulsion. It would have no kinship to compulsory arbitration. It would continue to promote peace rather than strife and to appeal to the better judgment and good intentions of industry and labor.

When this board is established and bolstered by adequate sanctions and a clarification of the substantive law, it will help to solve the thorniest problem confronting us today and be one of the chief bulwarks of our future economic prosperity and social justice.

TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1934

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to call, at 10 a.m., in room 335, Senate Office Building, Senator David I. Walsh presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Thomas, Erickson, Borah, Metcalf, LaFollette, and Davis.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. I suggest that the reporter insert the bill S. 2926 at this point in the record.

(The bill referred to is here printed in full as follows:)

A BILL To equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees, to create a National Labor Board, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Labor Disputes Act."

SEC. 2. The tendency of modern economic life toward integration and centralized control has long since destroyed the balance of bargaining power between the individual employer and the individual employee, and has rendered the individual, unorganized worker helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract, to secure a just reward for his services, and to preserve a decent standard of living, with consequent detriment to the general welfare and the free flow of commerce. Inadequate recognition of the right of employees to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing has been one of the causes of strikes, lockouts, and similar manifestations of economic strife, obstructing commerce and imperiling the general welfare. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of commerce, to encourage the establishment of uniform labor standards, and to provide for the general welfare, by removing the obstacles which prevent the organization of labor for the purpose of cooperative action in maintaining its standards of living, by encouraging the equalization of the bargaining power of employers and employees, and by providing agencies for the peaceful settlement of disputes.

(1) The term "person" includes individual, partnership, association, corporation, and the legal representative, trustee in bankruptcy, receiver, or trustee thereof, or the legal representative of a deceased person.

(2) The term "employer" means a person who has one or more employees, except that the term "employer" shall not include the United States, or any State, municipal corporation, or other governmental instrumentality, or any person subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or any labor organization, or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.

knowledge, actual or constructive, of the employer), or any individual formerly so employed whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice: Provided, That the term "employee" shall not include an individual who has replaced a striking employee. Wherever the term "employee" is used, it shall not be limited to mean the employee of a particular employer, but shall embrace any employee, unless the Act explicity states otherwise.

(5) The term "labor organization" means any organization, labor union, association, corporation, or society of any kind in which employees participate to any degree whatsoever, which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, or hours of employment.

(6) The term "commerce" means trade or commerce, or any transportation or cummunication relating thereto, among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State, but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

(8) The term "National Labor Board" means the National Labor Board created by section 201 of this Act.

SEC. 4. Employees shall have the right to organize and join labor organizations, and to engage in concerted activities, either in labor organizations or otherwise, for the purposes of organizing and bargaining collectively through representatives of their own choosing or for other purposes of mutual aid or protection.

SEC. 5. It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer, or anyone acting in his interest, directly or indirectly—

(1) To attempt, by interference, influence, restraint, favor, coercion, or lockout, or by any other means, to impair the right of employees guaranteed in section 4.

(2) To refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees, or to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

(3) To initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, bylaws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization.

(4) To contribute financial or other material support to any labor organization by compensating anyone for services performed in behalf of any labor organization, or by any other means whatsoever.

(6) To engage in any discriminatory practice as to wage or hour differentials, advancement, demotion, hire, tenure of employment, reinstatement, or any other condition of employment, which encourages membership or nonmembership in any labor organization: Provided, That where a contract or agreement of any kind is or shall be in force between an employer and a group of employees, the provisions of such contract or agreement regarding conditions of employment shall not, because of anything contained in this paragraph, compel an employer to observe similar conditions of employment in his relations with all his employees: Provided further, That nothing in this Act shall preclude an employer and a labor organization from agreeing that a person seeking employment shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join such labor organization, if no attempt is made to influence such labor organization by any unfair labor practice, if such labor organization is composed of at least a majority of such employers' employees, and if the said agreement does not cover a period in excess of one year.

SEC. 6. The several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain any unfair labor practice that burdens or affects commerce or obstructs the free flow of commerce, or has led or tends to lead to a labor dispute that might affect or burden commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce, and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, but solely at the request of the National Labor Board, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain any such unfair labor practices.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. There is hereby created a Board, to be known as the "National Labor Board" (hereinafter referred to as the "Board"), which shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Two of such members shall, at the time of nomination, be designated as representatives of employers, two as representatives of employees, and three as representatives of the general public. The members representing the general public shall be appointed for terms of five years each, and the other members shall be appointed for terms of one year each, and all members shall be eligible for reappointment. Any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one of the members representing the general public as chairman of the Board. No member representing the general public shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. A vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Board. The Board shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

SEC. 202. (a) Each member representing the general public shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. The other members shall each receive $25 per diem and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses when attending meetings of the Board. The Board shall appoint and fix the compensation of an executive secretary, and it shall have authority to appoint and fix the compensation of such attorneys, special experts, examiners, mediators, clerks, and other employees, and to establish such regional or local boards, as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress. The Board may make such appointments without regard to the civil service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The Board is directed to retain the officers and employees of the National Labor Board created by the President on August 5, 1933, to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient functioning of the Board.

(b) All the expenses of the Board, including all necessary traveling expenses outside the District of Columbia incurred by the members or employees of the Board under its orders, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the Board or by any individual it designates for that purpose.

SEC. 203. The principal office of the Board shall be in the District of Columbia, but it may meet and exercise all its powers at any other place. The Board may, by one or more of its members or by such employees as it may designate, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties in any part of the United States. A member who participates in such an inquiry shall not be disqualified from subsequently participating in a decision of the Board in the same case.

SEC. 204. The Board may, either by itself or through its agents, offer its services to the parties to any labor dispute as conciliator or mediator in such dispute, and may act as conciliator or mediator for the parties who accept such offer.

SEC. 205. (a) The Board is empowered to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice that burdens or affects commerce or obstructs the free flow of commerce, or has led or tends to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

(b) Whenever any member of the Board, or the executive secretary, or any person designated for such purpose by the Board, shall have reason to believe, from information acquired from any source whatsoever, that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, he shall in his discretion issue and cause to be served upon such person a complaint stating the general nature of the charges in that respect, and containing a notice of hearing before either an examiner or the Board at a place therein fixed, not less than twenty-four hours after the service of said complaint, but the examiner or the Board shall have discretion to continue or adjourn such hearing from time to time. Any such complaint may be amended by any member of the Board or by any person designated for that purpose by the Board at any time prior to the issuance of an order based thereon; and the original complaint shall not be regarded as limiting the scope of the inquiry. The person so complained of shall have the right to file an answer, to appear and give testimony at the place and time fixed in the complaint, and to avail himself of the compulsory process of the Board in summoning witnesses in his behalf. In the discretion of the examiner or the Board, any other person shall be allowed to appear in the said proceeding by counsel or in person to present testimony. In any such proceeding,the examiner or the Board shall not be bound by the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity.

(c) The testimony taken by an examiner or the Board shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the executive secretary. Thereafter, in its discretion, the Board may itself take further testimony and/or hear argument. If upon all the testimony taken, the Board shall be of the opinion that any person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue an appropriate order directed to such person. The order may require such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, or to take affirmative action, or to pay damages, or to reinstate employees, or to perform any other acts that will achieve substantial justice under the circumstances. Such order may further require such person to make a report from time to time showing the extent to which he has complied with the order. Until a transcript of the record in a case shall have been filed in a court, as hereinafter provided, the Board may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any finding or order made or issued by it.

(d) If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may petition any district court of the United States within any district wherein the labor practice in question was engaged in or wherein such person resides or carries on business, or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, for the enforcement of the order of the Board, and shall certify and file in the Court a transcript of the record upon which such order was entered, together with a copy of the findings and the order of the Board. Upon such filing of the petition and transcript. the court shall place such petition upon its motion or equity calendar and shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to make and enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Board. No objection to the order of the Board shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before the Board. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Board, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Board may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of aditional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, and shall file its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order. The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree, affirming, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, any order of the Board, shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate Circuit Court of Appeals or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C. title 28, secs. 346 and 347). The commencement of proceedings under this subsection shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Board's order.

(e) Any person aggrieved by an order of the Board may obtain a review of such order in any district court of the United States in the district wherein the unfair labor practice in question was engaged in or wherein such person resides or carries on business, or in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court, within ten days after the entry of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Board be modified or be set aside in whole or in part. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Board, and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court a transcript of the record, certified by the Board, upon which the order complained of was entered, together with a copy of the findings and order of the Board. No objection to the order of the Board shall be considered by the Court unless such objections shall have been urged before the Board. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Board, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Board may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, and shall file its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order. The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree, affirming, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, any order of the Board, shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate Circuit Court of Appeals or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbix, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347). The commencement of proceedings under this subsection shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Board's order.

(f) No court shall have any jurisdiction to enjoin the Board or an examiner from taking action or holding hearings under a complaint.

(g) Petitions filed under this Act shall be heard expeditiously, and if possible within ten days after they have been docketed.

(h) Complaints, orders, and other process of the Board and its agents may be served by anyone duly authorized by the Board, either (1) by delivering a copy thereof to the person to be served, or to a member of the partnership to be served, or to the president, secretary, or other executive officer, or a director of the corporation to be served; or (2) by leaving a copy thereof at the principal office or place of business of such person, partnership, or corporation; or (3) by registering and mailing a copy thereof addressed to such person, partnership, or corporation at his or its principal office or place of business; or (4) by sending a telegraphic copy thereof addressed to such person, partnership, or corporation at his or its principal office or place of business. The verified return by the person so serving said complaint, order, or other process setting forth the manner of said service shall be proof of the same, and the return post-office receipt or telegraph receipt for said complaint, order, or other process registered and mailed or telegraphed as aforesaid shall be proof of the service of the same.

SEC. 206. (a) The Board shall have power to act as arbitrator in labor disputes. When any of the parties to a labor dispute agree to submit the whole or any part thereof to the aribtration of the Board, and the Board accepts such submission, the agreement shall be valid, irrevocable, and enforceable as to the submitting parties save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract. In any case accepted by it for arbitration the Board shall have power to issue an award applicable to the submitting parties.

(b) Unless a party to the arbitration has otherwise stipulated at the time of the submission of the case to the Board, any party to the arbitration, or the Board itself, may within one month after the award is made, apply to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for an order confirming the award, and thereupon the court shall grant such an order unless the award is vacated, modified, or corrected as hereinafter prescribed. Notice of the application shall be served upon the other parties to the arbitration by the marshal of any district within which they may be found, in like manner as any other process of such court, and thereupon such court shall have jurisdiction of such parties as though they had appeared generally in the proceeding.

(c) The court may make an order vacating the award upon the application of any party to the arbitration if the Board exceeded its powers or executed them so imperfectly that a mutual and definite award upon the subject matter was not made. The court may make an order modifying or correcting the award upon the application of any party to the arbitration if (1) the award covers a matter not submitted to the Board (unless the award upon such matter does not affect the merits of the decision upon the matter submitted) or (2) the award is imperfect in matter of form not affecting the merits of the controversy. The order may modify or correct the award so as to effect the intention thereof and promote justice between the parties. A party to the arbitration, claiming to be aggrieved by the award, may apply to the court, within one week after the award is made, for an order vacating, modifying, or correcting the award. Notice of such application shall be served upon all other parties to the arbitration proceeding or their attorneys by the marshals of the respective districts within which such parties may be found. For the purposes of the application any judge who might make an order to stay the proceedings in any action brought in the same court may make an order, to be served with the notice of the application, staying the enforcement of the award.

(d) The party applying for an order confirming, modifying, or correcting an award shall, at the time the application is filed, also file the following papers with the clerk of the court: (1) An agreement to arbitrate; (2) the award of the Board; and (3) each notice, affidavit, or other paper used upon an application to confirm, modify, or correct the award, and a copy of each order of the court upon any such application. The order shall be docketed as if it were rendered in a suit in equity and shall have the same force and effect in all respects as, and be subject to all the provisions of law relating to, a decree in a suit in the court in which it is entered; and it may be enforced as if it had been rendered in a suit in the curt in which it is entered.

SEC. 207. (a) In any dispute as to who are the representatives of employees, the Board, if the dispute might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce, may investigate such dispute and certify to the parties, in writing, the name or names of the individuals or labor organizations that have been designated and authorized to represent employees. In any such investigation the Board shall be authorized to take a secret ballot of employees or to utilize any other appropriate method to ascertain their representatives. The Board shall decide whether eligibility to participate in elections shall be determined on the basis of employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other appropriate grouping.

(b) In any dispute not of the character described in subsection (a) as to who are the representatives of employees the Board may offer its services to aid in determining who are employees' representatives.

SEC. 208. For the purpose of all hearings and investigations, which, in the opinion of the Board, are necessary and proper for the exercise of the powers vested in it by sections 205 and 207 (a)—

(1) Any member of the Board, or any agent designated by it for such purposes, is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, take depositions, subpena witnesses, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, or other documents which the Board deems relevant or material to the inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory or possession thereof, at any designated place of hearing.

(2) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person, any district court of the United States, the United States courts, of any Territory or possession, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides, upon application by the Board, shall issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Board, or an examiner designated by it, there to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

(3) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, contracts, agreements, and other documents before the Board, or in obedience to the subpena of the Board or any member thereof or any agent designated by it, or in any cause, prodceeing, or investigation instituted by the Board, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him, may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no inidvidual shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise; except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

(4) Witnesses summoned before the Board or any of its examiners shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

(5) The several departments and agencies of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the Board, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any matter before the Board.

SEC. 209. The Board shall have authority from time to time to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Such rules and regulations shall be effective upon publication in the manner which the Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 210. Any person who shall willfully assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any member of the Board or any of its agents in the performance of his duties pursuant to section 205 or section 207 (a), shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

TITLE III

SEC. 301. There is hereby created in the Department of Labor the United States Conciliation Service, under the direction of a Director of Conciliation. The Secretary of Labor shall appoint and fix the compensation of such Director, and shall have authority to appoint and fix the compensation of such commissioners of conciliation, clerks, and other officers and employees as he may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of the duties of the Service, and as may from time to time be appropriated for by Congress. The Secretary of Labor may make such appointments without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 302. It shall be the duty of the United States Conciliation Service, whenever the Director deems it desirable, to offer its services to the parties to any labor dispute, and to attempt to adjust such dispute by consiliation or mediation, or by arranging for voluntary arbitration. Nothing in this title shall limit the power given to the Secretary of Labor under section 8 of the Act of March 4, 1913 (U.S.C., title 5, sec. 619).

SEC. 303. Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to interfere with or mpede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

SEC. 304. (a) Wherever the application of the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and/or of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes", approved March 23, 1932 (U.S.C., title 29, secs. 101–115), conflicts with the application of the provisions of this Act, the provisions of this Act shall prevail; Provided, That in any situation where the provisions of this Act cannot be validly enforced, the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and/or of such Act of March 23, 1932, shall apply.

(b) Any term of a contract or agreement of any kind which conflicts with the provisions of this act is hereby abrogated, and every employers who is a party to such contract or agreement shall immediately so notify his employees by appropriate action.

SEC. 305. If any provision of this act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner, you are the author of this bill?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have you address the committee.

STATEMENT OF HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER, SENATOR FROM NEW YORK

Senator WAGNER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the bill that I have introduced projects no novel element into the recovery program nor does it present a fundamentally new matter for the consideration of Congress. It is designed merely to carry out that program according to its original intent, and to bolster it at the only spot where experience has proved that it is lamentable weak.

Section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act was not a mere afterthought or appendage. It was one of the three mainsprings of cooperation among industry, labor, and government. Last June everyone realized that the spirit of united action must replace the blind competition that had lead to economic and social disintegration. But every realistic student of affairs knew that it would be unfair and dangerous to encourage one group to cooperate without encouraging others to do likewise. Such uneven development would enable the strong to oppress the weak and throw our entire industrial machinery out of gear. For this reason, Congress projected into economic affairs the essence of true democracy, by outlining a system of checks and balances between industry and labor, crowned by governmental supervision and advice.

Since the passage of the Recovery Act, the development of the practice of united action has been so one sided that there is danger of a worse balance than persisted in the past. Trade associations have been strengthened enormously, and industry has gained practically unchallenged control of the code authority mechanism. During the very same period, genuine cooperation among employees has received one setback after another.

The 40,000,000 working people in this country rightly feel that this is unfair, and their opinion meets with the substantial accord of all who are fair-minded.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this due to the one-sided views of the personnel of these boards?

Senator WAGNER. Well, it is due partly, perhaps, to one-sided views. It is due also to what I regard as misinterpretations of Section 7(a), and to the resistance of employers, as I shall develop.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you tell us later how these boards are constituted?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, I finish this and then I will be delighted to answer any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Senator WAGNER. Without full employee participation in the recovery program, wages are again lagging behind production and profits. This is a very important matter. If this disparity continues, we may expect another collapse. In addition, employees are becoming impatient at the denial of their rights, and strikes and violence are appearing in various parts of the country. I am in a position to know this. The very events are occurring that Congress sought to prevent by section 7 (a). The question is not one of abstract justice; it affects us all.

My 6 months' experience as Chairman of the National Labor Board, and the experience of innumerable other people who have been following conscientiously the course of events, indicate that the weaknesses in section 7 (a) should and can be cured. That is the object of the present bill.

The first defect of 7 (a) is that it restated the right of employees to bargain collectively, but did not impose upon employers the duty to recognize such representatives. Failure to acknowledge this correlative duty has caused more than 70 percent of the disputes coming before the National Labor Board. The new bill, therefore, provides that employers shall recognize those chosen by their workers and shall make reasonable attempts to arrive at satisfactory agreements. This provision does not tread upon new ground, but follows the well-tested experience of the Railway Labor Act.

The second defect in section 7 (a) has turned upon a question of interpretation. The law says that employees shall be allowed to choose their own representatives. This has been read to mean that even after the overwhelming majority in a plant desire a collective agreement covering all, the employer shall be free to deal individually with workers who want to make individual agreements. In this manner the closed union shop is illegalized.

The CHAIRMAN. Who made that interpretation?

Senator WAGNER. The N.R.A.

The CHAIRMAN. I wondered whether it was a legal interpretation by the Attorney General or not.

Senator WAGNER. No. The National Labor Board has rendered a decision very recently which takes the contrary view.

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon the interruption, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. I do not believe that Congress intended to illegalize a device which many experts believe necessary, in some situations, to obtain for labor equality of bargaining power and substantial justice. Congress certainly did not intend to impose upon employees restraints that did not exist before the Recovery Act was passed.

The new bill makes it perfectly clear that the closed union shop is not illegal. It leaves this question of policy open to industry and labor. At the same time, it surrounds nonunion members with safeguards by providing that only those seeking employment may be required to join a union, and that closed shop agreements may be made only with unions to which a majority of the employees belong.

The third and most important defect of section 7 (a) is that, while it provides that employees shall be free from interference and restraint in choosing their representatives, it does not prohibit the specific practices which make such freedom impossible. The greatest barrier to freedom is the employer-dominated union, which has grown with amazing rapidity since the passage of the Recovery Act.

The employer-dominated union generally is initiated by the employer. He takes part in the determination of its rules, its procedure, and its policies. He can terminate it at will and he exercises absolute veto power over its suggestions. Certainly there is no real cooperation on an equal footing between employers and employees under such circumstances.

Another feature of such a union is that it arbitrarily restricts employee cooperation to the single employee unit. The standardization and improvement of wage levels is an industrial or State or even national problem, that can hardly be solved if the employees of each plant act separately and are uninformed of what others are doing. No fair-mined employer should want to preserve this disunity among his workers when he is banding with other employers in huge trade associations.

The present bill seeks to prevent employers from dominating labor organizations by influencing their formation, policies, or elections, by subsidizing them, or by discriminating either in favor of or against particular unions by means of wage or hour differentials or other conditions of employment.

Let me make it absolutely clear that the bill does not in any way impair the right of employees to organize on the single employer or company union basis, if that is their desire. It simply forbids employers to force development along such lines alone, and prevents them from dominating their workers when the workers desire a company union.

It is equally important to note that the bill does not prevent employers from setting up societies or organizations to deal with problems of group welfare, health, charity, recreation, insurance or benefits. All of these functions can and should be fulfilled by employer-employee organizations. But employers should not dominate organizations which exist for the purposes of collective bargaining in regard to wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

Now as to the enforcement sections of the bill. The present Labor Board has sought to apply section 7 (a) by relying upon the prestige of its members and by appealing to public sentiment. During the summer these methods met with great success. But in recent months the Board has been confronted by some large employers who ignore public sentiment, who flaunt the clear intent of Congress, and who are a law unto themselves. This is extremely unfair to the vast majority of employers who want to obey the law, and it is disheartening to the millions of working people who see what was held up to them as a new charter being treated as a scrap of paper.

The present bill provides for a permanent Board with adequate enforcement provisions. It defines as unfair labor practices any attempts by employers to dominate labor unions or to fail to recognize the duly chosen representatives of their employees. When complaint is made of an unfair labor practice, the Board is authorized to hold hearings, subpena witnesses and records, and, if the law is violated, issue a restraining order enforceable in the courts.

The Labor Board is empowered to act also as conciliator and mediator. I am confident that this will be its chief function, and that it will continue the good work which has kept over 800,000 people at their jobs during the past 6 months. Most employers, as well as employees, want a peaceful forum and voluntary action.

I have noticed that several criticisms have been levelled against this bill, which I believe are important enough to be answered at the outset.

It has been remarked that the bill is one-sided because it imposes restraints upon employers without attempting to curb unfair or unruly employees. This criticism takes the bill out of the context of the Recovery Act situation. The Recovery Act contains grants and privileges to employers and employees. Employers have not met with any obstacles in their attempts to form trade associations. If they had, I should suggest the removal of these hindrances by legislation. But employees have met with opposition in their attempts at organization, and this should be remedied. It is absurd to characterize this bill as an employee monopoly simply because it seeks to achieve the fairness which the Recovery Act promised.

It has been argued that the unfair labor practices mentioned in this bill are vague, uncertain and unrelated to any practices heretofore characterized as "fraud, deceit and oppression." But this bill is not intended to be merely declaratory of what constituted unfairness in the early English law. It is a direct attempt to meet modern evils with modern remedies. Its specification of unfair practices is much more definite than that of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Nor are the practices to which the bill refers imaginary. They are based upon the studies and disclosures of hundreds of people who have observed the processes by which some employers dominate unions.

It has been urged that the bill places a premium on discord by declaring that none of its provisions shall impair the right to strike.

On the contrary, nothing would do more to alienate employee cooperation and to promote unrest than a law which did not make it clear that employees could refrain from working if that should become their only redress. But this bill will prevent strikes by the only feasible and just method; that is, by insuring fair treatment to all parties and by establishing a powerful and trustworthy agency for the settlement of disputes.

The same critics have claimed that the bill would prevent friendly relations between employers and employees becaues it prevents employers from influencing the rules or policies of labor organizations. Such an interpretation strains beyond all reason the provisions of this bill. Frank and friendly negotiations depend upon the absence of influence exerted by one party over the other. Only those whose minds are deeply rooted to the master-servant relationship in industry look upon employers' dominance as the only means of securing cooperation.

Most confusing of all are the charges that the National Labor Board under this bill would have powers greater than those of any court. Every competent lawyer understands the difference in functions and proceedings between an administrative agency and a court. The very purpose of an administrative tribunal is to provide an informal, flexible procedure designed to get at the heart of complex economic problems with a minimum of hard-and-fast legal rules. The power of the Board to amend complaints, and to allow some variance between the pleadings and proofs, is strictly similar to the procedure of the Federal Trade Commission. Likewise the provisions that the findings of the Board, if supported by evidence, shall be final as to the facts, and that the court proceedings shall be based on testimony taken before the Board, have become such commonplaces of our administrative law that it is amazing to find them open to sincere question.

Under the new bill, the orders of the Board are enforceable only through the courts, and any aggrieved party has the right of appeal to the courts. The bill does not take a single new step in outlining the respective scope of courts or administrative bodies.

Finally, some feelings have been expressed that the new Board would interfere with the work of the industrial mediation boards operating under the codes. There is no occasion for this fear. Every dictate of wise practice, and the pressure of business, would incline the Board to refrain from hearing cases until every other available remedy had been exhausted. For example, the United States Supreme Court has already worked out a well defined body of rules requiring that parties exhaust all other remedies before appearing before it.

I am confident that, when studied carefully, this bill will impress everyone with its moderation, its reasonableness and its imperative necessity. Ordinary dictates of justice and common sense require its speedy passage, and when it is passed we shall have taken the most important step since the Recovery Act toward improving the opportunities and maintaining the welfare of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner, the committee appreciates your clear and able presentation. Have any of the members of the committee any questions?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I would like to ask Senator Wagner, in view of his intimate knowledge of the situation that has grown up since the Industrial Recovery Act was passed, what his opinion is as to the situation that will develop if this legislation, or legislation seeking these objectives, is not passed at this session of Congress?

Senator WAGNER. In my opinion, failure to pass this legislation will certainly jeopardize the whole recovery program, because we have a situation now where employers under the Recovery Act have been encouraged—not only afforded the opportunity, but encouraged—to organize trade organizations. They are better organized today, may I say to the Senator, than they have ever been.

On the other hand, the workers, to whom we supposed we had given equal rights of organization, have had their efforts resisted at every turn, particularly by the large manufacturers, who have refused to recognize the men's representatives and have put every obstacle in the way of organization. Now, such an uneven industrial situation cannot continue without a collapse.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. There has been an increased indication of labor difficulties and strikes. What in your opinion is the chief cause of that manifestation?

Senator WAGNER. The very thing I said, failure to recognize the representatives that the workers had chosen. That has been the controversy in 70 percent of the cases before the Labor Board—an extraordinary thing. I might say also that there is a concerted anti-union effort among at least some employers, for since the Recovery Act there has been an extraordinary growth of company-dominated organizations.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. If legislation of this character is not passed at this session, what is your view as to the probability of increasing or decreasing labor difficulties and strikes during the balance of this year?

Senator WAGNER. I am afraid we shall have tremendous difficulties. I was going to say, almost so much that we shall not be able to cope with them. I do not want to make any such pessimistic prediction, but I sat all day yesterday at a Labor Board hearing which involved the question of recognition, and all that the workers asked in that case, and in a similar case today—perhaps we have today the most important case in the history of the Board—was an opportunity to elect their representatives. There is resistance to that request, and this has threatened to throw 100,000 on strike if the difficulties are not composed.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Is it a fair deduction, from your answer, Senator, that you view with grave alarm the situation so far as strikes and labor difficulties are concerned in the near future unless legislation of this kind is passed?

Senator WAGNER. I am terribly concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, there is no provision in this bill that denies the right to organize company unions?

Senator WAGNER. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The majority of the employees in any industry can organize a company union if they choose to?

Senator WAGNER. Of course, what we are preventing is only domination by employers.

The CHAIRMAN. From your experience, I judge there has been a tendency on the part of employers, particularly large employers, to try to create company unions with the idea that they could dominate them more easily than they could independent labor organizations?

Senator WAGNER. Exactly, and when I speak of the company union, the objectionable company union, I mean the one dominated or influenced by the employer.

The CHAIRMAN. How are you going to prevent an aggressive, dominating employer from getting control of 51 percent of his employees in order to control his company union?

Senator WAGNER. The only way is to prohibit, as we attempt to do in this legislation, the specific acts which experience has shown are the acts by which they influence the action of an organization.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Right on that point, Senator, what has been the experience of the Board in plants where employers have contended that there was no sentiment for an independent labor organization and where the Board has been able to provide for a vote on the part of the workers where they felt that their identity was not to be disclosed and they would be protected from any reprisal?

Senator WAGNER. I can give the Senator an instance that happened only last week in a very large factory in a Southern State where there were over 3,000 employees. A substantial number of them requested our board to order an election. They had a so-called "representation plan" under which they became very restive because they felt it was simply an employer-dominated organization. After some efforts we finally persuaded the employer to consent to such an election. We were told at the time that it was a useless procedure, that the workers all wanted this representative plan, and that we were inconveniencing the employers for no good purpose.

An election was held and the company union was defeated by the outside union by a vote of 20 to 1. This is what happened when employees had a free choice, and were able to cast their ballots without any interference, intimidation, or coercion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this bill the result of the experience of those who have been associated with you on the Labor Board trying to find a solution for the evils or barriers that were experienced in the handling of this problem?

Senator WAGNER. I cannot speak for all members of the board, but it certainly reflects the experience of some of us. It reflects my own experience. As to this legislation, I alone am responsible for it, and I do not want to hold anyone else responsible.

The CHAIRMAN. For the record, Senator, will you tell us just how the Labor Board is constituted and what are its functions?

Senator WAGNER. Well, it is a body of citizens appointed by the President, really not holding any public office at all. We take no oath nor do we receive compensation——

The CHAIRMAN. How many members?

Senator WAGNER. Eleven.

The CHAIRMAN. And what do they represent in the private affairs of life?

Senator WAGNER. Five are representatives of the workers and five represent industry. If you will exclude myself, I think they are very eminent members, all very well known in their respective fields.

The CHAIRMAN. And are you the 11th member?

Senator WAGNER. I am the impartial chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Just what problems are delegated to you?

Senator WAGNER. Simply to compose labor disputes, for which purpose we have outlined our own procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. How do they arise? Does someone petition you where there is a labor difficulty, either the employer or the employees?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. One side or the other asks us to intervene, and sometimes we even intrude where we think think a strike is imminent which we may prevent. The Board has not done its work dramatically or spectacularly, but I think has made an extraordinary contribution toward preserving industrial peace.

The CHAIRMAN. It is all voluntary, I assume?

Senator WAGNER. Yes, it is all voluntary.

The CHAIRMAN. And have you worked out your own regulations and methods of procedure?

Senator WAGNER. Yes, we have. We have 20 regional boards through the country, upon which serve the most eminent citizens available in the various communities. They work without compensation and have rendered an effective and patriotic service.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any statistics available as to the number of strikes that have taken place since the N.R.A. began to operate?

Senator WAGNER. We have available statistics of those of which we are cognizant. We have made reports on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Could we have it?

Senator WAGNER. I shall be delighted to bring them.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood you to say that 75 percent of these strikes that have come to your attention have been due directly or indirectly to the failure of the employer to recognize the rights of the employee to organize as of their own choosing?

Senator WAGNER. Exactly; the disputes were not always strikes, for we have prevented——

The CHAIRMAN. Threatened strikes?

Senator WAGNER. Yes, exactly, where there have been disputes involved.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it might be well to have those statistics that you refer to incorporated at the conclusion of Senator Wagner's testimony so that they will be in the record.

Senator WAGNER. I will present them.

SUMMARY OF TABLES OF NATIONAL AND REGIONAL LABOR BOARDS

Total cases: National, 190; regional, 1,628; total, 1,818.

Cases settled: National, 132; regional, 1,121; total, 1,253. Of these, cases settled by agreements were: National, 103; regional, 533; total, 636. Settled by decisions: National, 29; regional, 254; total, 283.

Total workers involved: National, 400,000; regional, 514,000; total, 914,000.

Strikes: National, 132, involving 325,000; regional, 467, involving 170,000; total, 599, involving 495,000.

Strikes settled: National, 107, involving 213,000; regional, 371, involving 131,000; total, 478, involving 344,000 (strikers returned to work).

Strikes averted: National, 24, involving 33,500; regional, 173, involving 105,500; total, 197, involving 139,000 (kept at work).

Workers reinstated (exclusive of strike figures) after charges of discrimination, unjust layoffs, etc.: Regional, 6,852.

Cases pending: National, 27; regional, 295 (incomplete); total, 322. In addition, National referred 25 to regional boards).

Causes of complaint—

Alleged violation of section 7(a) (collective bargaining, union discharge for union activity, interference, etc.): National, 145; regional, 777 (incomplete); total, 922. Wage demands: National, 37; regional, 241; (incomplete) total, 278. Reduced weekly earnings (generally under shortened code hours): Regional, 43. Elections supervised: National, 39; regional, 58; total, 97. Cases jointly submitted for arbitration: National, 11; regional, 59; total, 70.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we also ought to have in the record the language of section 7 (a) to which you refer, and which I notice was not set forth in your speech.

Senator WAGNER. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it is rather necessary to have that in view of your basing your reasons for this legislation upon the misinterpretation of the section and failure of it to function clearly in the interests of the employees.

7 (a) Every code of fair competition, agreement, and license approved, prescribed, or issued under this title shall contain the following conditions: (1) That employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of the employers of labor, or their agents, and the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or any other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or their mutual aid or protection; (2) That no employee, and no one seeking employment, shall be required as a condition of employment to join any company union or to refrain from joining, organizing, or assisting a labor organization of his own choosing; and (3) That employers shall comply with the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other conditions of employment, approved or prescribed by the President.

Senator WAGNER. My own view has always been, Mr. Chairman, that the present company-dominated union is a violation of section 7 (a) as it exists today. But I do not know what the courts would do, and there have been others administering the law who differ with my interpretation. This bill is simply to carry out what I believe is in the intent of Congress.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. One other question, Senator: Is it your view or is it not that this legislation is permanent in character, and that the services to be rendered by the Board which the bill would establish would be rendered regardless of congressional or executive determination or as to the continuance of the National Industrial Recovery Administration?

Senator WAGNER. Oh, yes; this is permanent legislation. It is to create a permanent body and, I think, a very essential one. I think it is a great step forward.

The CHAIRMAN. Have there been attempts in the Department of Labor to do some conciliatory work in connection with strikes and have they met with success?

Senator WAGNER. The difficulty is that no power exists.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Thomas desires to ask you a question.

Senator THOMAS. Senator Wagner, you have connected up and linked up this proposed legislation very well with your experience in the last few months; will you go a little further and link it up with the evolution of labor legislation in the past, so we can see if it is a permanent evolutionary development or whether it is rather sporadic, growing out of that which has happened lately?

Senator WAGNER. I think that for a great many years, Senator, those who have been interested in avoiding industrial strife and bringing about industrial peace and industrial democracy have advocated some board of mediation, conciliation, and arbitration when both parties submit. In addition, they have believed that there ought to be some powers existing for the prevention of certain practices which interfere with equality of bargaining power.

I think it has been recognized that, due to our industrial growth, it is simply absured to say that an individual, one of 10,000 workers, is on an equality with his employer in bargaining for his wages. The worker, if he does not submit to the employers terms, faces ruin for his family. The so-called freedom of contract does not exist under such circumstances.

The only way that the worker will be accorded the freedom of contract to which, under our theory of government, he is entitled, is by the intrusion of the Government to give him that right, by protecting collective bargaining. When 10,000 come together and collectively bargain with the employer, then there is equality of bargaining power. That is all this legislation attempts to preserve, and I think it is a matter of evolution.

The CHAIRMAN. It need not be unanimous; a majority have that right, that is your view?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; it must be that way or you will never get anywhere.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. This is an application, is it not, of the same general principle which was involved in the Railway Labor Act, to the entire industrial field?

Senator WAGNER. Exactly; it is a development of that legislation, of course.

Senator THOMAS. Do you assume this is broad enough and general enough to cover our complex conditions as they exist in the different parts of the country?

Senator WAGNER. I think so.

Senator THOMAS. There has been a review, or, rather, a survey, made of various parts of the country in various industries and various occupations attempting to bring this bill into effect, has there not?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. Of course, this legislation, like all other legislation of its kind, is always for the recalcitrant minority. I will say that the majority of employers, by far, want to deal fairly with their employees, but the minority prevent them from doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. I am surprised to have you tell us, Senator, that your greatest difficulty has been with the group that employ the largest number of employees; that is, the bigger industries.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly. They have regarded——

The CHAIRMAN. Is that true in the commercial field also? Do you think the bigger commercial dealers have exercised the same attitude toward their employees?

Senator WAGNER. Well, usually in commercial lines there is less difficulty. We have not had, as I recall it, any great difficulties. It has been primarily in the major industries, the large industries.

Of course, the N.R.A. and the fixation of hours has brought to the surface a great deal more exploitation of labor than I think any of us realized existed in this country. We have a tremendous problem ahead of us. Give the worker the right to organize and collectively bargain and he will eventually remedy that type of exploitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be pleased, Senator, to have you keep in touch with us during the course of these hearings and participate in the questioning.

Senator WAGNER. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. I observe the Secretary of Labor is in the room. Will you come forward, Miss Perkins?

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANCES PERKINS, SECRETARY OF LABOR

Secretary PERKINS. I am here this morning, sir, at your request, to express my very great interest in this measure, and to say that I think it is one of the most important which has been before the Senate in a long time.

The bill, as you know, has three titles, title 1, dealing with certain substantive provisions which are to establish clearly the practices; title 2, establishing a Labor Board to exercise judicial authority with regard to whether or not the fair labor practices described in title 1 have in effect been lived up to in any given case; and title 3, giving a clear statutory basis for the conciliation service in the Department of Labor.

I want to point out that, if I may, sir, discuss title 2 first, I should like to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed as you choose.

Secretary PERKINS. Title 2, establishing the Labor Board, seems to me to be a very important step forward in our progress of management of our community life and a step forward in the practice of democracy, for we have undoubtedly recognized in the last 10 years a very great disparity between the opportunities of workers to determine the conditions of their work and the opportunities of their employers to determine those conditions, and yet, under our democratic form, we have held that all men should be equal in respect to the performance of all of the obligations.

We have found it necessary under the development of our common law and our statute law, to provide for judicial tribunals to determine certain items which men even in a Democracy were not able to adjudicate fairly for themselves, and, so, it seems to me, we have come to the time when the establishment of a judicial tribunal to determine certain things in the relationship between employers and employees is definitely indicated, and that we shall be making real progress in an orderly and democratic life if we establish on a permanent basis a national labor board which shall have certain very definite powers and duties which we all understand.

Of course, the right of workers to organize and the right of workers to deal collectively with their employers existed before section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act. Nevertheless, section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act, by a very definite and clear statement of the Congress, reestablished and reaffirmed those rights and obligations and, apparently, because of the fact that the Congress itself modified the terms of the bill when it was before the Congress, it seems quite clear that the Congress had a definite conception of the rights and duties and opportunities of wage earners to deal collectively with their employers.

The Congress having, therefore, within the past year taken affirmative action on this point, and having reaffirmed the rights of labor to organize and deal collectively with the employers, has, therefore, it seems to me, a further obligation to clarify it, if it needs clarification, that relationship, and to establish on a permanent basis a tribunal before which the facts with regard to whether or not employees have had that opportunity can be clearly established.

The Labor Board has been set up, as you know, by Executive action during the summer because of the necessity which developed, at once, of having some trustworthy authoritative tribunal before which these questions could be put and where decisions which would be recognized as valid and impartial decisions could be rendered.

So, we have had 7 months experience with this type of organization even though it did not have the powers that it might have had conferred upon it if it had been established by a duly considered act of the Congress.

It was an emergency creation and has served an extraordinarily useful purpose, and I say this as one who has not been a member of the Labor Board, but who has cooperated with the Labor Board, who has observed the activities of the Labor Board, observed the cases that have come before it, and who knows of the countless decisions that have been made which were complied with and about which there has been no question.

The public in general and perhaps you, sir, are, however, better acquainted with the few cases which have been outstanding and in which the Labor Board has not been able to bring about a complete compliance with its decision. Those, of course are the items which concern us, and which put before you the necessity of taking some affirmative action which will define more clearly in the interests of the practice of democracy just what these obligations are and just what the duties and limits of authority of the Labor Board are.

Now, this Labor Board, in the 7 months of existence on an experimental basis, not constituted by Congress, has, nevertheless, given an authoritative interpretation of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. It is highly essential that there should be a definite interpretation of it. As a tribunal composed of men experienced in industry and labor questions, and as a tribunal dealing with controversies that have arisen, it has been able to build up in these 7 months, I think, the beginnings of a common law of industrial relations. This method of building law by decisions in particular cases does not seem to me to avoid the faults inherent in general laws which might be passed, or general orders which might be issued by administrative officers. It is, of course, a somewhat slower process, the process, the process of adjudication in particular cases and the evolution of principles out of cases, but, I think, an infinitely safer process than orders in council or the administrative orders, or even acts of Congress defining such delicate and as yet undetermined things as the rights and duties of both parties in industrial relations where our thinking has not been clear and where the natural rights are not so obvious as they are in some of the other human relations with which we have dealt in the past by our statutes or by our Constitution.

The Labor Board has, moreover, by utilizing the principle so familiar to the American Commonwealth, of holding elections to determine what are the desires of individuals, has carried over into this field principles well established in American democracy, and a discipline well established in our lives, the discipline of elections and of the rule of the majority.

It has acted, as you know, as a board of elections, and has conducted innumerable elections to determine what were the desires and what was the will of the wage earners in the community, in the industry, or in the plant with regard to their representation in dealing with their employers under the collective bargaining requirements of section 7 (a), and I think that that has been an extremely wise procedure, one which grew, as we may say, quite naturally and spontaneously out of the exigencies of the situation as they came this summer, and one which can safely be continued for a most conservative and yet democratic interpretation of the needs of the community in developing the human relations of employer and employee and the human relations between groups of employers and groups of employees on a sound and substantial and just basis.

By using its national prestige as an industrial labor board to act as arbitrator in cases voluntarily submitted to it, in which the parties in advance agreed to accept the final decision of the Board, it has produced a fundamental body of rulings, all of which it appears to me have been in the interests of law and order in industry, and in the interests of the progressive utilization of the disciplines of democracy in settling these controversies, these complexities of needs, and of interests between the two great parties of our industrial life.

Moreover, this board by regulation and by experimentation is working out the board's relationships to other agencies for the settlement of industrial disputes. The Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor, and the industrial relations board, and the cotton textile code authority, and the coal code authority, has performed a very useful service in determining just what the relationships between this board and other instruments of conciliation and arbitration might be, and this process of experimentation should, it seems to me, be allowed to continue. We have not yet reached the limits of the possibilities of cooperation or the possibilities for a great variety of devices to bring about the right relationship between employer and employee interests in a great democracy which is, after all, devoted constructively to the interests of all the people, not only the two great parties to the industrial situation.

Where this board has been inadequate it has been, I think, largely due to the lack of definite outlines of its powers, of its duties, and of its responsibilities, and due to the fact that the public in general, not knowing those definite outlines and not having the habit of acceptance of its authority, has been unwilling to participate voluntarily and to agree voluntarily to its decisions.

As, of course, you know, and as has been pointed out to you, because of the very Executive order under which it existed and because of the lack of congressional definition as to its authority, the board has lacked power to summon witnesses and to require elections to be held and to restore to their positions men who have been discharged for organizing, to stop discrimination, and so forth.

These powers, it seems to me, clearly can be conferred by Congress and ought to be conferred by Congress if the board is to fullfil all of its very great possibilities for usefulness in our community in this transition period.

I also think that the board has been obliged by the exigencies of the situation of the summer to mix its duties and by so doing has perhaps sometimes impaired its prestige. It has been obliged to mix its judicial duties with the technique of conciliation. I feel that it is desirable to separate the duty of conciliation from the duty of a judicial board. A judicial board ought, in my opinion—and this labor board, if it is created by Congress as anticipated in the draft before you, will be primarily a judicial board—a judicial board ought to confine its duties to really serious determinations of fact and the law, but ought not to attempt to make a conciliation in which the real desire is to reach a compromise.

A judicial board ought to be building up the body of our law and the body of our understanding, and our interpretation of law which we may come to count upon as a set of precedents.

A conciliator, however, on the contrary, goes into a particular situation and attempts to find a formula upon which both parties may agree at the moment, which may or may not be in the line of permanent justice.

This board, I think, should be confined to the practice of justice in in this very unusual field, whereas the function of conciliation and mediation is an important function, but I do not think it should be performed by the same board.

The continuation of the function of conciliation in the Department of Labor closely allied with the National Labor Board is, I think, highly desirable. Moreover, I think the National Labor Board, recognizing as it will in certain cases that come before it, that as a practical matter the proper technique in the particular case is not a judicial decision but conciliation—that is, many cases are brought, as you know, almost in the spirit of litigation and will be brought before any board which is a judicial board in the spirit of litigation, and the judge sitting upon that case sees at once that what is really needed is not a judicial decision but some negotiation, some method of bringing the parties together to agree upon a compromise which will meet the particular situation—the board should have the power to establish or to authorize the creation of boards of conciliation or boards of mediation or to refer the case for conciliation or for mediation to a properly constituted authority, but I feel that it should itself not engage and so impair its prestige in actual conciliation as it has been obliged to do.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the function of conciliation that your Department now possesses?

Secretary PERKINS. The Department of Labor has a function of conciliation—it has three functions, arbitration, mediation, and conciliation, and they are rather distinct in the understanding of the Department.

Arbitration is a function which, as is well known, can be exercised only when both parties to a controversy agree to permit a third party to act as an arbitrator and agree to abide by the decision of that third party. The Department of Labor can exercise the function of arbitration when both sides agree to it.

The Department of Labor can also act as mediator, that is, it can of its own interposition and without invitation of either side, intervene in an industrial dispute with suggestions as to ways of bringing the conflicting parties into agreement, with suggestions perhaps as to the formula upon which they may agree.

It can also act in a third capacity of conciliation, by which is meant commonly a more or less negative activity in which the conciliator attempts to be the go-between between the parties who are in conflict until they, acting through him, come to some formula which it appears can be mutually agreed upon. Thereupon he retires from the scene leaving them to agree.

I am just defining this very roughly.

The CHAIRMAN. You have a bureau in your Department that handles those functions?

Secretary PERKINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the title of the officer of the bureau?

Secretary PERKINS. He is known as the "Director of the Conciliation Service," and there is a title known as "Commissioner of Conciliation," who are individuals appointed for the purpose of conciliation. Nevertheless, within the bureau we can perform the other functions.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees in the bureau?

Secretary PERKINS. Thirty.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it proposed that the functions of that bureau be transferred to this board?

Secretary PERKINS. I should be very loath so to recommend, sir.

Senator WAGNER. No.

Secretary PERKINS. I think it is not proposed in this bill. Title III of the bill preserves the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor. That function should go on and rather be strengthened by the existence of the Labor Board. That is my conception of it.

Senator WAGNER. It is preserved by this bill.

Secretary PERKINS. Yes; it is my conception that that function in the Labor Department ought to be preserved and strengthened, sir, and that the cooperation between the Labor Board and the Department of Labor in the performance of the function of conciliation ought to be clearly defined so that the Labor Board may refer cases for conciliation to the Department of Labor rather than attempting to perform the compromise and conciliation service itself, and so, I think, impairing somewhat its prestige as a judicial body engaged in a more serious and more dignified work.

Senator WAGNER. They have been doing that now, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Care has been taken in drafting this bill to prevent any conflict between the powers of the board created here and the Department of Labor?

Senator WAGNER. Oh, yes; there is no conflict now, and, as a matter of fact, we utilize to a great extent through the genuine cooperation of the Secretary, the conciliation clause of the Department of Labor in our efforts to compose differences.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Secretary PERKINS. On the composition of the board I think that public and the Government members of the board are necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. You are referring to the board?

Secretary PERKINS. To the board as created by this bill. I think that permanent public and Government representatives to give the board continuity, to give it disinterestedness, and to give it the services of persons who gradually acquire from a long period of service a certain expertness in those particular problems.

Moreover, I think it is wise and necessary that there should be members from industry and from labor in order to keep the board in touch with current activities and current thought in the industrial field on both sides, and to keep it from being a purely remote judicial tribunal that has no real and vivid relationship to the industrial needs of the moment.

My own suggestion with regard to this would be that in view of the provision which is made in this bill for its composition, that there should be rather panels from which the employer and employee members can be drawn, and that these panels should be perhaps not less than six or seven on each side, and that employer and employee members should be drawn from those panels to sit for a longer or shorter period of time or to sit even on special cases or special classes of cases.

I think this would be extremely important in bringing into the board those individuals on both the labor side and the employer side who have particular knowledge of the industry or of related industries in which the controversy is at that moment raging.

It is one of the most difficult things for a meat packer, for instance, to sit with any kind of intelligence upon a dispute in the cotton textile industry, and yet he may be an extraordinarily wise employer, but when it comes down to the particular questions, which, for instance, are involved in the stretch-out, he has relatively no knowledge which makes him a sound judge of what is just and fair.

It has been my experience that men are at their best in a moral sense, that is, their moral aspects function more keenly, when they are in the field of the material that they know well, and that they are inclined to follow somebody else's leadership in the details of a field which they do not know well.

Their principles are all right, but the application of them is sounder when they come into a field which they know well. I should be very much in favor of a panel system.

I also think it is highly important, in drawing up this board, that the employer-employee members of it be so selected that we are certain to escape the inhibiting effects that have so often come about in boards composed of the three parties, by drawing on to the employer-employee membership only the retired people—that is, those who are already out of active relationship to industry. Only by making their period of service short can you be certain to secure for this constructive judicial activity those who are at present in active relationship to both the labor movement and to the employer responsibility. Out of that you get a very much sounder permanent system, it seems to me, than if you rely upon those who have already given over active responsibilities for the conduct of industry and leadership of labor.

I think one of the most important things that will grow out of such a board as this is that the active participation of both employer and employee in the educative experience of finding a formula, will develop a technique which is for the welfare of the whole American people.

I also wish to recommend to you, sir, that this board should be located not as an independent office of the Government, but should be located in the Department of Labor. I could, with equal logic, recommend that it be located in the Department of Commerce, or located in the Department of Justice, if you like, but I think it should be located in a regular department of the Government, a permanent department of the Government, one which has an officer, who has a place in the Cabinet of the President. I think that only by such location will you get that attention, that prestige and that continual cultivation and fostering of this important new function in our life that it deserves and that it ought to have. I am very much afraid if we pass into a period of prosperity, when these problems become less acute, that there will be that neglect of such a board in the public mind and in the conceptions of Congress, and in the conceptions of any administration which happens to be in power that it may lose its prestige as a national body. I think that its purposes can best be served by being attached to a regular department of the Government.

You will forgive me for a certain jealousy when I say I think it should be attached to the Department of Labor, I really believe that that department will be the department in which it can be developed into its soundest activities and can be given the very fullest cooperation. Here it can find the greatest integration with the other activities of the Department of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. And especially if you are going to maintain the functions which you now have in the Bureau of Conciliation?

Secretary PERKINS. Especially if you are going to maintain the functions which we now have in the Bureau of Conciliation.

The CHAIRMAN. Don't you think the membership of seven is a little large? This bill provides a membership of 2 representing the employers, 2 representing the employees, and 3 representing the general public. The three representing the general public are given a salary of $10,000. Don't you think it would be better to have just a board—I would like to have your views about that—three members, those representing the employers and employees to be associate members?

Secretary PERKINS. That is a possible device. You mean by "associate members" members without a vote but in an advisory capacity?

The CHAIRMAN. In an advisory capacity. Let the responsibility rest upon the three representing the public interest.

Secretary PERKINS. That is a perfectly possible device and one that is not without sound and reasonable basis.

The CHAIRMAN. May I suggest that you and Senator Wagner give some consideration to that suggestion which has been made?

Secretary PERKINS. I shall be glad to, but I would like to say at this moment, that after having given that considerable thought, my conclusion—although this is susceptible of correction, if the Senator wants to talk it over with me—my thought is that on the whole it would be wiser to maintain representation with vote by both employer members and labor members. That is for the present. It may be that we shall work out of that, but we are engaged at the present time in a mutual experience in this country, one in which the educative experience of responsibility in this field, is, I think, of extreme importance both to the employers' and employees' representations.

When an employer comes to take responsibility for a suggestion affecting the public interest, which he must take when he is sitting on one of these boards, he does begin to take a more impersonal and impartial view of the dispute than he does if he is only an adviser, and therefore in almost a special pleader's relationship. I think the same is undoubtedly true of the labor side.

The CHAIRMAN. My experience is that where you have a board composed of officials who are paid a full salary and other members of the board are paid a per diem, there is apt to be conflict in the feeling that the full-paid officials have superior rights, and are apt to assume them and proceed without consulting those who are on a per diem basis on the board.

Secretary PERKINS. In this proposed board you have self-interest motivating both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. I think if you have one commissioner, one representative of the employers and one representative of the employees, that my objection would not be so sound, but I think with 3 full-paid public officials serving on the commission and the other 4 being called in on a per-diem basis, there is apt to be a feeling that the other 4 are inconsequential in their rights and powers. At another stage we can discuss this section of the bill.

Secretary PERKINS. I think Senator Wagner can tell you more clearly than I can, out of his very large experience this summer, that the problems before the labor board have been so great as to make it physically difficult to handle the number of cases coming before it, and it is highly desirable it should be able to reconstitute within itself a group to hear a special case, and in that group there should be representation of all three parties.

Senator WAGNER. I will discuss that with the committee later on.

Secretary PERKINS. I also wanted to point out, sir, another reason for placing it in the Department of Labor is that the Department of Labor already has a large personnel which could be called into the service of this labor board appropriately, because they are already specialized on certain fields with which this labor board would have to come in contact. They could be called to do this service appropriately, if it were in the Department of Labor, and so save such expenditures that might otherwise be necessary by a growing staff for such a bureau or board.

The CHAIRMAN. I think Senator Wagner would probably agree if this board should be under the direction of any department it should be the Department of Labor.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It isn't necessary, but it could go there.

Senator WAGNER. I am agreeing with Madam Secretary on that particular phase of it. We rarely differ on anything.

Secretary PERKINS. I want to point out one more thing on this. I do not think the board, if it should be placed in the Department of Labor, should be under the authority of the Secretary of Labor. I want to make that quite clear. I think the board should be appointed by the President and should have the distinction and prestige that comes from such appointment, and the independence from any rule or any imposition of a point of view by the Secretary of Labor. It should be an independent board. The fact it is attached to the Department of Labor would not in any way bring it under the control of the Secretary of Labor, and I do not think it should be.

I think, looking forward into the future, we recognize that this board will be judicial in its nature, and should, therefore, not be dominated by any Secretary or any Secretary's point of view, but that the attachment to the Department of Labor, as a purely administrative function, would be relatively simple.

Senator Wagner will recall in the Department of Labor in the State of New York there exists a judicial board appointed by the Governor, not responsible to the Commissioner of Labor in any way, and yet able to call on the Commissioner of Labor for such services and personnel as it needs, and the Commissioner of Labor is obliged to give them such services. It has worked out in a very satisfactory way for the particular judicial function which has to be performed there, and has made a minimum of cost and of conflict.

The CHAIRMAN. We have such a board in Massachusetts, in the department of industry and labor.

Secretary PERKINS. Yes. That is similar and is appointed also by the Governor and is separate from the Commissioner's authority and has a very definite usefulness.

With regard to the substantive provisions of title I, I think the time has come to review very seriously the responsibility of the Government to various individuals who have taken literally, in the course of the past 9 months, the meaning of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. The Department of Labor has investigated over 3,200 complaints against 264 employers where it was charged that there had been discharge and discrimination against individuals because they had attempted to organize a union or an organization of employees independent of the employer. There are other cases I know in the hands of the Labor Board and in the hands of other departments of the Government. These individuals undoubtedly acted, it seems to be clear on investigation, within what they believed to be their rights and their opportunities under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

The Government and Congress certainly has an obligation to people who find themselves in that position, who are discriminated against, and there should, therefore, I think, be some clear definition of just what the responsibility and responsibilities, opportunities, and obligations of both parties to this contract are. Workers should be reassured and reconfirmed in the rights of free speech, free assembly, free association in any organization of their choice, and the right to elect representatives to represent them in the details of their collective bargaining, and there should be some clear definition by Congress that the management itself cannot interfere or intervene in the free choice of the workers of their representatives.

We have used the term "company-dominated union", for want of a better term. That is almost identical with what we mean by the term which is used when they speak of the captive mines. It is a union or an organization formed by the ownership or management of the company, dominated in its policies, and in many cases the officers salaried or paid on time by the employer. No such organization can, or course, exercise really independent judgment with regard to the major issues and the major points of difference between the employers and employees in that plant or in any industry.

The free opportunity for organization of the workers for purpose of being represented in a collective bargain is, it seems to me, essential to the further development of a sound industrial relationship in the interests of all of the people of America.

We are now in a transition period in our history and in our economic life. There is no reason why a people who are committed as we are to the conception that by the proper use and employment of political democracy we can solve our problems cannot avoid the major injustices which people have suffered under any other transition periods. I am not one of those who think that industrial dispute is necessarily wrong or always disastrous. There is a natural conflict of view in many aspects of life which springs up, and there must be a settlement of that conflict. It must be settled either by the economic action of those who are in control on either side, or it must be settled by some appeal to a constituted judicial procedure. It may sometimes involve utilization, and probably should involve the maintenance of both methods and both techniques, but unless we have an orderly judicial process there will assuredly always be the appeal to economic force even at times when it is not necessary and not wise, and when it involves an unnecessary hardship upon the whole community as well as upon those who are parties to the dispute. A useful and practical alternative is desirable—the public interest.

Therefore it seems to me that this session of Congress should give very great heed to the possibilities of the further development of the judicial method as an opportunity for the settlement of such industrial disputes as can be properly settled by the judicial method.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any questions by the committee? If not, Madam, let me express the thanks of the committee for your able presentation and to express the hope that we may keep in touch with you and have your further advise and cooperation.

Secretary PERKINS. I shall be very glad to keep in touch with you.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Dr. Francis J. Haas in the room?

Senator WAGNER. He is coming here tomorrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Milton Handler, general counsel National Labor Board and professor of law at Columbia University.

STATEMENT BY MILTON HANDLER, GENERAL COUNSEL TO THE NATIONAL LABOR BOARD AND PROFESSOR OF LAW AT COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name, please.

Mr. HANDLER. Milton Handler.

The CHAIRMAN. And your present occupation or profession?

Mr. HANDLER. General counsel to the National Labor Board, professor of law at Columbia University.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been general counsel?

Mr. HANDLER. Since October 8, 1933.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have your views in regard to this legislation.

Mr. HANDLER. If it please the members of the committee, I should like to review briefly the experience of this board since its establishment on August 5, 1933, last year, and to acquaint you with some of the difficulties under which it has labored, to explain the need of new legislation and to analyze some of the important features of the pending bill.

I have with me in my brief case some of the documents you requested in the testimony of Senator Wagner, which I should like to present to the reporter, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you may leave them with the secretary.

Mr. HANDLER. The present Board was established primarily as a board of mediation to compose industrial disputes, and for that reason it was organized on a bipartisan basis, with equal representation to labor and to industry, with an impartial chairman at its head. The volume of disputes during the early phases of the recovery program required the establishment of regional or local boards throughout the country in order to handle this tremendous volume of cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the regional boards act in those cases that are referred to them by the Federal board here?

Mr. HANDLER. Well, we have worked out a procedure whereby cases come before the Board either on the complaint of the parties or on the motion of the Board, and when a dispute arises either our boards in the field may take action on their own motion, or the cases may be referred to them by the Department of Labor, or they may be referred to them by the administrative staff of the Board. We have worked out necessarily a complete and whole-hearted cooperation between the Department of Labor and the administrative tive staff of the Board in order to avoid duplication of effort in any of these cases.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not quite understand what the regional board does.

Mr. HANDLER. Well, the regional boards are composed of equal representatives of management and labor under the head of an impartial chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they first try to settle any local trouble, and if they are unable to settle it, it comes to the larger and central board here in Washington?

Mr. HANDLER. Precisely. The Board has assembled a staff of competent mediators whose function it is of adjust the disputes in the field, in cooperation with the regional boards.

Senator DAVIS. How many conciliators have you?

Mr. HANDLER. We have approximately 10.

Senator DAVIS. May I ask you what they receive monthly? Are they all on a per-diem basis or a monthly salary?

Mr. HANDLER. Some are on both, but I do not have those details just now, Mr. Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You will furnish us with that information?

Senator DAVIS. Will you produce it for the record?

Mr. HANDLER. I will be delighted to.

The CHAIRMAN. You might let us have a record of the complete personnel of the organization. I suppose there is no objection to that, Senator Wagner?

Senator WAGNER. Of course not.

Senator DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the decisions that have been made by the Board inserted in the record at this point.

Mr. HANDLER. I have them with me.

Senator WAGNER. All the decisions?

The CHAIRMAN. All the decisions made by the Board you mean?

Senator DAVIS. Yes; if they have them.

Senator WAGNER. That would make a volume in itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Public Printer have sufficient paper? He says they are very voluminous.

Senator DAVIS. A digest would not be out of place, would it, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. We can give that. I don't know as you want them all printed in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not want a written transcript of all the decisions?

Mr. HANDLER. We have the decisions of the Board.

Senator DAVIS. I just want a digest.

The CHAIRMAN. We have asked for a number of cases already. Now we would like to have the decisions, whether or not there was a settlement made, and just briefly what it was. Is that right, Senator Davis?

Senator DAVIS. That is right.

Mr. HANDLER. I might state the decisions of the Board are now in the hands of the Public Printer and they are going to be published in a volume.

Senator DAVIS. If they are it is not necessary to put in here.

Mr. HANDLER. So they will be readily available.

Senator DAVIS. That is all right.

Mr. HANDLER. The Board also has a compact administrative staff which has been set up to supervise the work of the regional boards, to control the field work, prepare the hearings before the full Board, to conduct research and advise the Board on the legal phases of the problems that are presented to it, and to supervise the compliance with the Board's rulings.

Now, while the Board was initially designed to mediate industrial disputes, it has served as a board of arbitration in cases where joint submissions were voluntarily made to the Board, and in the course of time it took on a new function, namely the enforcement of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act.

Now, the strength and the weaknesses of the present Board can be illustrated by an illustration of the way in which a typical case has been handled by the Board, if the members of the committee would be interested in my doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have you.

Mr. HANDLER. Relying upon the provisions of section 7 (a) of the act, the workers in a plant form their organization. Upon refusal of the employer to recognize——

The CHAIRMAN. You are giving a specific case now?

Mr. HANDLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without mentioning names?

Mr. HANDLER. Without mentioning names.

The CHAIRMAN. Very good.

Mr. HANDLER. It is quite typical.

The CHAIRMAN. Very good.

Mr. HANDLER. Upon refusal of the employer to deal with the officials of a union a strike is called. Now as soon as the board learns of the strike it sends a mediator to the field to adjust the dispute, if that be possible. If he fails, the parties are then summoned to appear before the full Board, which is either a regional board or the National Labor Board, depending upon the importance of the case. Strikes have generally been settled along the following lines, after full hearing by the Board: An agreement is made between the parties to the dispute and the Board and it provides typically for the following: First, the strike is called off and the workers are reinstated without discrimination; an election is held to determine who shall represent the workers and to settle this disputed question of the authority of the officials of the union to represent the workers. The employer agrees to bargain collectively with the representatives selected at this election held under the board's supervision and the parties agree to submit all their differences which cannot be settled by negotiation either to a board of arbitration or to the National Labor Board or the regional labor board for final decision. Now in this way the board developed the election by secret ballot under governmental supervision as the administrative device under section 7 (a) for determining the representatives of the employees.

Now the procedure, as you will observe, has been entirely voluntary. In the great bulk of the cases before the board this method has been eminentlysuccessful. The mediators have settled on just and equitable terms innumerable strikes in the field, and the mere existence of this administrative machinery, the local and national boards, has been responsible for the averting of countless disputes.

Now, difficulty has arisen where the parties have refused to appear before the Board, where the terms of settlement proposed by the Board have been rejected, where the employers have refused to furnish the Board with their payrolls and the cooperation which is essential if a fair and reliable election is to be held, and finally, where the hearings disclosed violations of the statute. In the last instance the lack of power on the part of the Board to enforce its decision, and its inadequate facilities for the detection of violations, have made it difficult to enforce the law with desirable vigor and promptness.

Now, these difficulties are explicitly dealt with by the present bill. One of the major purposes of the bill is to provide the necessary machinery for the amicable adjustment of labor disputes. The mediation powers of the Board are continued, and, in my opinion, very properly so. Mediation is most successful when undertaken by a single individual. For this reason it is contemplated, under the bill, in continuation of our past practice, of having an experienced staff of mediators for field work. But where such mediation fails, and it does fail in many cases, unless there is to be a continuation of strife, it is imperative that there be some agency with adequate prestige to intervene in the interest of the public, and to bring about a peaceful settlement. It is for that reason that I urge that the bill remain the mediation functions of the present Board.

I can illustrate the importance of the mediation function by referring to a case which is pending before the board today. A serious dispute is pending in the automobile industry. A single mediator, either of our Board or a conciliator of the Department of Labor, is powerless to handle a dispute of such magnitude. Now we send in every case an individual into the field, a man who is trained in industrial relations and who, in the overwhelming majority of the cases, is able to effect settlement. But there must be some agency of the Government to which resort can be had where the single individual, the mediator or conciliator, fails, and unless this board is given that mediation power there will be no agency to handle a dispute which cannot be settled by a mediator. Without granting those functions to this board, the result would be that such disputes would remain unsettled until the parties were worn out by their strife or until one had prevailed over the other as a result of brute strength.

I might add that the main function of this Board and the real reason for its establishment was to compose those differences that were threatening the recovery program, to settle that multitude of strikes that occurred during the summer, disputes which the mediators and conciliators were unable to settle themselves.

Now, a national board, commanding public respect, can, by reason of its high office and detachment, inquire into the facts and propose an equitable basis of settlement, and informed public opinion is all that is necessary to enforce its decisions. Such a board must be composed of several impartial representatives of the public, in order that it possess the disinterestedness essential to command public respect.

Now, the bipartisan aspect of the Board, with a representation of labor and industry, is chiefly valuable in the peaceful settlement of disputes, in the exercise of the mediation functions of the board. When it comes to the purely judicial work of the Board, where you are inquiring into questions of law violation, obviously the value of the layman is somewhat diminished. They contribute greatly to an understanding of the problem, but you must have a corps of disinterested public representatives who are competent by training and experience to handle questions of law and judicial problems that arise in such cases.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a good distinction. I suppose that is the reason for constituting the board as suggested?

Mr. HANDLER. Yes. Experience has demonstrated that the power of subpena is essential in order to bring recalcitrant parties before the board. Otherwise the aims of the statute can be frustrated in the very cases requiring the intervention of a disinterested and responsible agency of the Government.

I should like to expand that, if I may. Where you get a very serious industrial dispute, where feeling runs very high, and where there is considerable bitterness, the man who goes out in the field is unable to bring the parties together. Now without the power of subpena, the board has found that in such cases, where intervention is imperative and necessary in the public interest, one of the parties would fail to respond to its invitation to appear before the board, to permit the board to furnish its good offices in the settlement of that dispute. Now, to my mind it is imperative that the board have the power of subpena in such cases, to call the parties together for a free and frank discussion of the difficulties. There is no compulsion whatsoever about such a procedure. The only compulsion is to have them come down and sit around the table and discuss their difficulties in the presence of a governmental body.

Senator DAVIS. If the Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor had such power as you are asking now for the National Labor Board, wouldn't the Division of Conciliation be able to act just the same?

Mr. HANDLER. I think not, Mr. Senator, for this reason: That in these disputes of national scope, it is important that you have a board of the prestige such as the present Board, composed as it is of the leading members of both labor and management, and under the high supervision and leadership of the Senator.

Senator DAVIS. The Division of Conciliation is national in its scope.

Mr. HANDLER. Yes, but it does not command the same respect and prestige.

Senator DAVIS. Why should not it command the same respect? It is a governmental bureau, it has the Secretary of Labor to back it up—and that appointment is made by the President, just as you are arranging to make the National Labor Board here.

Mr. HANDLER. I might answer that by saying that your point illustrates the necessity for having the bipartisan representation on the Board. With the highest respect for the Department of Labor and its Division of Conciliation, it does not, in the public estimation, command the respect and confidence of men such as Mr. Swope, Mr. Green, Mr. Lewis, and the like.

Senator DAVIS. Yes; but the act creating the Department of Labor could be amended to give the President the right to appoint the men, if they want, and they could be a part of the Department of Labor and the Board would have the power of a Cabinet officer back of them, rather than they being more or less an independent board, such as is proposed in this act. It isn't, after all, so much the man as it is the governmental power back of it.

Mr. HANDLER. If I may state my personal opinion, as long as you have a governmental body, there is room for a difference of opinion as to whether it should be an independent agency, with all the respect that an agency which is independent of any department commands, or whether it should be a part of a department of the Government.

Senator DAVIS. It doesn't make any difference where it is. I cannot understand why we want to create two boards to do the same work.

Mr. HANDLER. Well, I do not believe that they do the same work. Of course this board is going to have these powers of conciliation and mediation powers.

Senator DAVIS. Well, those powers could be granted to the particular board by amending the act creating the Department of Labor.

Mr. HANDLER. That would merely mean having a National Labor Board in the Department of Labor, rather than as an independent agency of the Government.

Senator DAVIS. That is right.

Mr. HANDLER. My own opinion is it will command a much greater respect if it is entirely independent of any executive department.

Senator DAVIS. Well, you say an independent board, independent of a Cabinet officer, will command greater respect than one that is in a bureau without a Cabinet officer at the head?

Mr. HANDLER. I believe so. Of course the bureau takes on the appearance of a mere appendage to a great department.

Senator DAVIS. Then you are developing a new board without any experience, and you have 16 or 17 years' experience back of the Department of Labor.

Mr. HANDLER. Well, there has been the closest cooperation between the two, and all the mediators are men of great experience and training.

Senator DAVIS. Why have that close corporation when one division can do it?

The CHAIRMAN. Are you through?

Senator DAVIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I infer from what you say, that the employer and employee is psychologically affected very much by whether the decision made in his dispute is by some department employees as now in the Department of Labor, or whether it is made by a board directly constituted and appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. HANDLER. Yes. I think a close analogy would be whether you would want the Interstate Commerce Commission as an independent agency, or whether you would want to put it in the Department of Commerce as an appendage of that department.

The CHAIRMAN. The first part of the question by Senator Davis was to the effect that he thought that these powers that are proposed in this bill should be given to the bureau now in the Department of Labor, and I take it that your answer to it was that such a method does not command the attention, the respect, and the solemnity that a decision affecting their rights would command by an independently constituted board?

Senator DAVIS. In other words, following that along, you must have a lot of window dressing, and stage setting to enforce a governmental decree.

Mr. HANDLER. I do not think I should agree with that. I think if a board exercising judicial functions is to command the highest respect, it ought to be put on an entirely independent basis.

Senator DAVIS. My own opinion is, having some little knowledge, and watching it since the department has been organized, that I do not know a man in the United States that could command greater respect than the Director of Conciliation in the Department of Labor. I think he is the best authority in the United States on that particular subject.

Mr. HANDLER. I would agree without reservation to that, Mr. Senator.

Senator DAVIS. You would what?

Mr. HANDLER. I said I would agree without any reservation to that.

Senator DAVIS. Then why divert from a man who is thoroughly equipped in every way to direct the conciliation, mediation, and arbitration forces of the Government to somebody that has got to learn it all over again?

Mr. HANDLER. I do not believe that the bill diverts any power from him, because most of the conciliation work is going to be carried on by Mr. Kerwin's division. The intention of the mediation clause is to enable it to supplement and to step in where his conciliation has been unsuccessful.

Senator DAVIS. You have 10 conciliators under the National Labor Board, you have 30 in the Department of Labor, in the Division of Conciliation; that is 40. Why could not they be all together? This is all industry, your troubles all come from industry, and they are in touch with industry, they have the machinery to reach industry, and the men who are affected by it know that it is the Labor Department and they would want to go there to have it adjusted.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner would like to ask a question.

Senator WAGNER. Professor, in some of the questions that have come before the Labor Board for judicial determination, there is the implication of cases coming before the United States Supreme Court? I mean there are great property rights involved, and they are important questions of national policy that are involved, which are way beyond a mediator in a department, and would not it be almost like attempting to put the United States Supreme Court, a body of that type, or the Interstate Commerce Commission as a bureau in a department, with these great industrial questions, which are the most important, I think, now in our whole economic life coming up for a solution? Would a bureau in a department be the proper place for the solution of these great controversies?

Mr. HANDLER. I should think not, Senator.

Senator DAVIS. After all, wouldn't it be this, that the parties who are aggrieved, who are depending on a decision from the National Labor Board, have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court, and after all the National Labor Board is more or less a bureau in the Government, compared to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. HANDLER. I think it is going to develop in time as the ultimate tribunal for the settlement of industrial disputes.

Senator WAGNER. I do not think the Senator is sufficiently familiar with the work of the board.

Senator DAVIS. Couldn't you have just as competent men in the Division of Conciliation as you have in the National Labor Board?

Mr. HANDLER. I do not believe it could work that way without the independence that is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the amount of this work, I will ask you, Senator Wagner, grown in tremendous volume since the N. R. A.?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. HANDLER. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean the work that the Department of Labor performed in the past is insignificant with the tremendous amount of work that has come out of the N. R. A.

Mr. HANDLER. The volume of work increased tremendously. It was entirely beyond the power of the Department of Labor to handle it.

Senator DAVIS. How many workers have you had out on strike at one time under the N. R. A.?

Mr. HANDLER. I do not believe any such figures have ever been collected, Mr. Senator.

Senator DAVIS. Could you give the Committee an estimate?

Mr. HANDLER. I am afraid I could not.

Senator DAVIS. What would be your highest estimate of the number that were out on strike at any one time under the N. R. A.?

Mr. HANDLER. I could not estimate it, because there are strikes that occur in industries that are not under codes, local strikes and national strikes, and the situation varies from hour to hour.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose, Senator, it would be more important, perhaps, to know the number of strikes, rather than the number of employees.

Senator DAVIS. I am asking that for my own information.

The CHAIRMAN. Or the percentage.

Senator DAVIS. Would you have 1,200,000? Have you had that many out at one time?

Mr. HANDLER. I should think it would not reach that magnitude.

Senator DAVIS. Well, I have seen it in the Department of Labor, with the entire coal and railroad industries closed down, and that was satisfactorily adjusted by the Department of Labor.

Mr. HANDLER. Well, the President, with the aid of Congress established in the railroad——

Senator DAVIS. Just a minute now. We are talking about the Department of Labor not being qualified to adjust labor disputes. I have seen the textile industry on strike, and they adjusted it. I have seen the entire coal fields down, and they adjusted it. I have seen pretty nearly the entire Brooklyn shoe industry out on strike, and they adjusted it. I have seen nearly every ship that came into our ports, tied up by strike, and they adjusted it. I have seen the glass industry at a standstill, and they adjusted it.

Mr. HANDLER. Mr. Senator, I yield to no one in my high and exalted respect for that division in the Department of Labor. The precedent for this bill is the Railway Labor Act, where you do have an independent agency. The purpose of this body, don't you see, is primarily judicial, to pass upon the violations of the statute, and it is mediatory where the Department of Labor has been unable to effect a settlement. The fact remains that sometimes the Department is unable to effect a settlement, and in such case you need a Board of this composition to bring about a proper settlement.

Senator DAVIS. Well, let us take the Standard Oil, for instance. They have a collective bargaining scheme in which the Secretary of Labor is the last word, is the so-called "Supreme Court" of the Standard Oil industry. I know for 12 or 13 years, since that has been put into effect, there has not been an appeal from the Secretary of Labor to the Supreme Court of the United States. They, the Labor Department, have adjusted all these disputes in the Standard Oil, as well as those strikes in other particular industries. I cannot quite understand, if there is an appeal to be taken, why it could not go from the Labor Department to the Supreme Court, as well as it could go from the Labor Board to the Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the wish of the committee? Would you like to sit beyond the present hour? Perhaps we ought to finish with this witness anyway.

Let me say, Senator, I think if it is possible we ought to try to work out legislation that will establish some governmental agency that will prevent or arrest the losses and disturbances that result from strikes, by settling threatened strikes.

Senator DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with you.

The CHAIRMAN. It is rather easy to settle a strike after it happens, because one or the other has got to give in ultimately.

Senator DAVIS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. What we should seek is the creation of a governmental organization that will prevent strikes, that will check them before the workers are out on the street and their families obliged to suffer.

Senator DAVIS. I am in accord with you on that. I would like to ask one other question before we adjourn, if I may. Is it your idea that this tribunal, in the matter of adjusting industrial disputes, be more or less of a supreme court in industry, to be a part of the judicial system of the country?

Mr. HANDLER. No; it is an administrative agency with the power to find facts. A full and ample court review will be provided for by the statute.

Senator WAGNER. The bill, if the Senator will take the time to read it, clearly sets forth exactly what the purpose of the creation of the board is.

Senator DAVIS. I desire to say to the Senator that I have spent more time reading this bill than any bill pending in Congress, because I believe this bill is very close to the hearts of the working men and women of America. It is for that reason that I am interested.

Senator WAGNER. I am glad to have the Senator's cooperation.

Senator DAVIS. I have always given the Senator my cooperation in these matters, and as I understand the administration, they want friendly criticism and wholesome suggestions, in order that we might have a perfected bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman is glad to see the spirit of the Senate prevailing in the committee.

Can you finish in a short time, Mr. Handler? We have diverted you, I am afraid.

Mr. HANDLER. I think I can finish in 5 or 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Senator DAVIS. I will not interrupt you any more.

The CHAIRMAN. Your interruptions are helpful, Senator.

Mr. HANDLER. For the enforcement of the law, added powers are needed. Enforcement, to be effective, must be speedy. Under the present statute, interminable delays have resulted from the fact that numerous administrative hearings have been held by agencies without power to enforce their decisions. The courts cannot be relied upon exclusively for the enforcement of legislation dealing with the delicate problems of industrial relations. Hence the need of an administrative agency with the power to issue orders enforcible in the courts.

It has been claimed that unprecedented powers are vested in the proposed board. This criticism springs from a misconception of the functions and nature of an administrative body. The procedure of an administrative body must be flexible. If it is to be effective, it must not be restricted by the technical rules of pleading, practice, and evidence, which prevail in the courts. It must have the power to proceed on its own motion, or upon complaint. It must apprise the respondent of the nature of the offense with which he is charged, it must afford him a full and fair hearing, its order must be definite and precise—and the bill so provides—but there is no need for its pleadings possessing the attributes of criminal pleading, or for its hearings to be as formal as a court trial. It must not be forgotten that the orders of the board are not self-executing; they can only be enforced in the courts and they will only be enforced if the constitutional rights of the parties to a fair hearing are scrupulously observed. The board can merely proceed upon the evidence submitted, and an order which is not based upon the evidence would not stand up in the courts.

The administrative provisions of the statute are modeled upon those of similar administrative agencies created by Congress with some modifications designed to avoid some of the difficulties experienced by such agencies.

The power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers is no broader than those habitually conferred upon administrative bodies. The complaint must state the general nature of the offense charged. The complaint may be amended during the hearing—but so may court pleadings under our modern procedure in the absence of surprise. It is unthinkable that the Board would not afford a full opportunity to the parties to respond to the issues developed at a hearing. If it failed to do so, no court would affirm its rulings. Effective administrative action requires an informal procedure, but the right of court review adequately protects against any abuse of power.

The findings of fact by the Board should be conclusive upon the courts; otherwise there would be endless trials of the same issues, and there would be no point to an administrative determination. The bill provides for hearings either in Washington or the field in order to suit the convenience of the parties or witnesses, and to permit the adjustment of disputes and the investigation of cases in the locality where they occur. The bill contemplates hearings shortly after the service of the complaint, as speed is imperative in this type of dispute. Flexible provisions for service of processes have been adopted, but adequate notice is afforded.

The effectiveness of administrative bodies has frequently been impaired by the raising of objections in the courts which were not presented to the Board. In all fairness, the Board should have an opportunity to pass on all objections in the first instance. Similarly if after the order is presented to the court, it becomes desirable to adduce additional evidence, the case should be returned to the Board for further hearing.

An additional method of enforcement is provided for in the form of suits in equity by the Attorney General to restrain violations of the statute. There are cases where immediate relief may be needed and where there is not sufficient time for following the procedure prescribed for the issuance of orders.

The conflicting interpretations of section 7 (a) and the current misunderstanding of its provisions require supplementary legislation clarifying its provisions. The bill in sections 4 and 5 does little more than clarify section 7 (a) and accords with the administrative interpretation of the statute by the present Board. Section 7 (a) confers the right of collective bargaining upon employees; it does not expressly impose reciprocal obligations upon employers. Nor does it define collective bargaining. The bill, on the other hand, in section 5 (2) makes explicit what is implicit in 7 (a), namely, that employers are obligated to exert every reasonable effort to make agreements with their employees. Section 7 affords freedom in the choice of representatives, but it does not expressly provide that employees may be represented by a union. The bill defines representatives as including unions. The right of employees to be represented by those not in the company's employ has been questioned in many cases before the Board. The bill in section 4 clearly indicates that there is no restriction upon the choice of representatives.

The meaning of interference, restraint, and coercion as used in section 7 has caused much difficulty. The bill employs language that is at once broader and more specific. A troublesome question has been whether the initiation and participation of the management in the creation of company unions is an act of interference within the meaning of section 7 (a). This is cleared by the specific prohibitions in the bill against the participation of the management in any labor organization, which are predicated upon the principle that an agent cannot serve two masters.

There are various questions of substantive law covered by the statute which I should like to discuss, but as time is lacking, I shall merely enumerate them, and I shall be happy to discuss them at some future time, such as—

(1) Recognition of representatives (sec. 5 (2)).

(2) Discrimination regarding wages, hours, tenure of employment, reinstatement.

(3) Validity of closed-shop agreements.

(4) Effect upon company-union plans formulated in anticipation of the statute. (See sec. 304 (b).)

(5) Reinstatement of employees discharged for union activity.

(6) Premature elections by employers to prevent unionization.

(7) Participation of strikebreakers in elections.

(8) Payment of back pay in cases of discriminatory discharges.

(9) Validity of lock-outs to prevent unionizat ı, and so forth.

There are many technical questions of procedure and administrative action which I should be glad to discuss at a later hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. We want to thank you very much. We will be free to call on you again?

Mr. HANDLER. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I will leave the documents with the secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

NATIONAL RECOVERY ACT (SEC. 7 (A) (B))

[PUBLIC—No. 67—73D CONGRESS]

[H. R. 5755]

AN ACT To encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of, America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I.—INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

SEC. 7. (a) Every code of fair competition, agreement, and license approved, prescribed, or issued under this title shall contain the following conditions: (1) That employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; (2) that no employee and no one seeking employment shall be required as a condition of employment to join any company union or to refrain from joining, organizing, or assisting a labor organization of his own choosing; and (3) that employers shall comply with the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other conditions of employment, approved or prescribed by the President.

(b) The President shall, so far as practicable, afford every opportunity to employers and employees in any trade or industry or subdivision thereof with respect to which the conditions referred to in clauses (1) and (2) of subsection (a) prevail, to establish by mutual agreement, the standards as to the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and such other conditions of employment as may be necessary in such trade or industry or subdivision thereof to effectuate the policy of this title; and the standards established in such agreements, when approved by the President, shall have the same effect as a code of fair competition, approved by the President under subsection (a) of section 3.

2. Statement of N.R.A., through its industrial and Labor Advisory Boards.
3. Statistics of work of National Labor Board.

1. Statement by the President, August 1933

"Of importance to the recovery program is the appeal to management and labor for industrial peace, which has just been sent to me for approval.

"With compelling logic, it calls upon every individual in both groups to avoid strikes, lockouts or any aggressive action during the recovery program.

"It is a document on a par with Samuel Gompers' memorable war-time demand to preserve status quo in labor disputes, and in addition to the signature of the president of the American Federation of Labor it carries the signature of every great labor leader and every great industrial leader on the two advisory boards of the Recovery Administration. It is an act of economic statesmanship. I earnestly commend it to the public conscience.

"This joint appeal proposes the creation of a distinguished tribunal to pass promptly on any case of hardship or dispute that may arise from interpretation or application of the President's reemployment agreement. The advantages of this recommendation are plain and I accept it and hereby appoint the men it proposes whose names will carry their own commendation to the country."

2. Announcement by the National Recovery Administration

August 5, 1933.

Creation of a National Board of Arbitration to mediate disputes or controversies between employers and employees arising through differing interpretations of the President's reemployment, was announced today by the National Recovery Administration's Industrial and Labor Advisory Boards.

The announcement includes an appeal to labor and industry alike for a moratorium on disputes which would impede the progress of the President's recovery program. It reads as follows:

"The country in the past few weeks has had remarkable evidence of cooperation in the common cause of restoring employment and increasing purchasing power. Industrial codes are being introduced, considered, and put into effect with all possible dispatch, and the number of firms coming under the President's reemployment agreement is inspiring.

"This gratifying progress may be endangered by differing interpretations of the President's reemployment agreement by some employers and employees.

"The Industrial and Labor Advisory Boards jointly appeal to all those associated with industry—owners, managers, and employees—to unite in the preservation of industrial peace. Strikes and lockouts will increase unemployment and create a condition clearly out of harmony with the spirit and purpose of the Industrial Recovery Act. Through the application of the act the Government is sincerely endeavoring to overcome unemployment through a Nation-wide reduction in the hours of work and to increase purchasing power through an increase in wage rates. This objective can only be reached through cooperation on the part of all those associated with industry. In order to develop the greatest degree of cooperation and the highest type of service on the part of management and labor, we urge that all causes of irritation and industrial discontent be removed so far as possible; that all concerned respect the rights of both employers and employees; avoid aggressive action which tends to provoke industrial discord, and strive earnestly and zealously to preserve industrial peace pending the construction and adoption of the industrial codes applicable to all business, large and small. Exceptional and peculiar conditions of employment affecting small employers and others whose business circumstances merit special consideration will be handled with due regard to the facts of the situation and with the desire to achieve increased employment and purchasing power.

"This appeal is made to the sound judgment and patriotism of all our people in the belief that even the most vexatious problem can be settled with justice and expedition where employers and employees act in accord with the letter and spirit of the National Recovery Act, without fear that any just rights will thereby be impaired. In that way only can the reemployment agreement be made to apply with the fairness pending the adoption of the code.

"To protect every interest, it is the unanimous recommendation of the Industrial and Labor Advisory Boards of the National Recovery Administration that a board to which differences may be referred should be created, this board to be made up of the following members: Hon. Robert F. Wagner, United States Senator from New York, chairman; Dr. Leo Wolman, chairman of Labor Advisory Board of N.R.A.; Walter C. Teagle, chairman of Industrial Advisory Board of N.R.A.; William Green; John L. Lewis; Gerard Swope; Louis E. Kirkstein.

"This board will consider, adjust, and settle differences and controversies that may arise through differing interpretations of the President's reemployment agreement and will act with all possible dispatch in making known their findings. In return, employers and employees are asked to take no disturbing action pending hearings and final decision. This board will promptly proceed to establish such central and local organizations as it may require to settle on the ground, such differences as arise in various parts of the country."

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION

Immediate release, January 6, 1934. Release No. 2599

AFFAIRS OF 600,000 WORKERS HANDLED BY NATIONAL AND REGIONAL LABOR BOARDS

A total of 600,000 workers have been involved in cases which have been handled by the National and regional labor boards, according to tabulations made public today by Senator Robert F. Wagner.

The Board's reports show a high proportion of settlements by agreement, a diminishing number of strikes, increased recourse to the system of labor boards for arbitration, and a diminishing number of cases listed as still pending.

"A total of 350,000 workers were involved in National Board cases to December 15, and about 220,000 in regional board cases", said Senator Wagner. "Since then cases involving 120,000 more have come up. Allowing for duplications the total is about 600,000."

On the latest date (Dec. 15) for which comparable reports had been obtained from the National Board's 17 regional boards the totals involved were as follows:

In addition, the National Labor Board itself had taken jurisdiction of 155 cases involving 350,000 workers; 97 cases were strikes or lockouts; 104 cases had been settled, largely by agreement; 14 cases were pending; 25 had been referred to regional boards and 6 to the Labor Department or special committees. The National Board had held 43 hearings and supervised 31 elections.

Notable features of the work of the regional boards were the number of strikes averted, 87, and of strikes settled, 273; 11 boards.

"Reports show a continuation of the trend which I first pointed out a month ago," said Senator Wagner. "Namely, a diminution in the number of actual strikes and a corresponding increase in the number of cases submitted before strike or lockout. Recourse to the system of boards for purposes of arbitration also is on the increase. The proportion of cases pending is low. The work of the regional boards has received the congratulations of the National Board and deserves the thanks of the country. Sample reports lying before me read as follows:

"From the New York board, from October 24, when it was appointed, to December 15: Total cases, 170; workers involved, 21,087; strikes settled, 148; strikes averted, 22; arbitration agreed to, 6; workers reinstated following discrimination because of union activities, 552.

"From the New England Regional Board: Cases, 54, involving 11,000; strikes averted, 6; strikes and lockouts settled, 11; elections held, 7; voting, 3,700.

"From the Chicago board: Cases, 69, involving 32,663 workers; 13 settlements by agreement, involving 17,809; 8 strikes pending; 49 cases under investigation, the fact of taking jurisdiction in many instances having averted strikes.

"From Cleveland: 49 cases, from 15 northern Ohio cities; settlements by agreement, 16; decisions and recommendations, 12; 8 strikes averted, involving 6,100; total workers involved, 14,700; returned to work after discrimination for union activity, 300.

"From the Detroit Regional Board: 102 cases, involving 18,444 workers; settlements, 83; number of strikes, 75; settled, 73.

"From New Orleans Regional Board: 13 cases, involving 10,242; strikes and lockouts, 5; strikes averted, 8, involving 8,900.

"The lists of cases read like a roster of the Nation's industries, so varied have been the problems put before the boards. No case has been too small, as many cases involve only 2 or 3 workers; and a single case may involve 70,000. All the while it must be remembered that the boards' members, some 170 men, are volunteers serving under Presidential appointment without compensation, comprising busy industrialists and labor leaders, with impartial chairmen drawn generally from the ranks of universities or the bench.

"Despite certain recalcitrants, the outstanding thing still is the widespread acceptance of this system of settlement of disputes, which was created by Presidential order adopting a joint proposal of capital and labor. Instances of what are termed 'defiances' of the boards naturally make more spectacular headlines than do these quiet labors which, for example, prevent strikes from breaking out and so into the newspapers. Those who do challenge the boards' activities are, I am afraid, people with bad cases and bad consciences. Unquestionably there is a small minority, the same minority which wants all the advantages of the National Recovery measures and none of the responsibilities, and to deal with this minority steps will have to be taken to prevent their getting an advantage over the majority which is honestly endeavoring to attain the better industrial relations necessary to recovery and reform."

National Recovery Administration (National Labor Board)

LABOR BOARD SYSTEM HANDLED CASES OF 900,000 WORKERS

The affairs of over 900,000 workers, Senator Robert F. Wagner announced today, have been passed upon by the National Labor Board and its regional labor boards in the shape of labor disputes brought before this system of mediation and arbitration. The National Labor Board was set up last August and began to form regional boards late in October.

Tabulations made public by the Board, based on detailed reports from the regional boards, show that the regional boards have handled so far 1,628 cases. Adding the 190 cases of the National Board makes a total of 1,818 cases.

The regional board cases involved a total of 514,321 workers. To this must be added, approximately 400,000 workers in cases brought before the National Labor Board, making a total of 914,000.

"Getting along toward the million mark", said Senator Wagner, "in the number of workers whose representatives and employers have appeared before the Labor Board system proves what a necessary and progressive step the President took in establishing the National Labor Board.

"The fact that the work gets heavier shows another thing, namely, the steadily increasing recourse had to the boards.

"This is pointed out in most of the reports from the 17 regional boards, which I have been examining; labor in established areas continues to resort to the regional boards in preference to striking. Some boards' reports show a greater number of strikes averted than of strikes breaking out. Other boards report a marked increase of strikes in areas to which new organizing movements are extending.

"A number of boards, however, report an increased tendency on the part of a small minority of employers to resist decisions of the boards. Complementarily these boards report an increasing amount of criticism by labor for failure to enforce Board decisions. Boards in widely distant parts of the country report impediments to their work by a minority which is watching 'how certain cases come out.'

"The sum total of impressions based on reports from New England to California is that the overwhelming majority of employers and employees use, trust, and support this system of industrial adjustment."

National Board settlements were 132 cases out of 190. Regional board settlements totaled 1,021 out of 1,628. Combined total, 1,153 settlements out of 1,818 cases. The National Board settled 107 out of 132 strikes.

The percentage of regional board settlements range from 89 percent (New York board) down to 31 percent. The great variation in the success of the boards is attributed, in the regional board reports, to the varying conditions in different communities, principally to the local willingness or unwillingness of parties to abide by Board decisions.

The regional boards' reports show a total of 466 strikes, of which 359 were settled. In addition 169 strikes were averted.

The regional boards have 373 cases pending; the National Board, 27; total 300.

NOTE.—Duplications, of cases involved both in the regional boards' reports and the National Board's report, are canceled out, in the estimate of the Board's statistician, by a very large number of "adjustments" which a number of boards make without recording them in their tabulations as "cases."

Summaries of cases handled by the National Labor Board and regional labor boards follow:

NATIONAL LABOR BOARD SUMMARY, FEBRUARY 1, 1934—continued

Total workers involved in cases	400,000
Number of strikes	132
Number of strikes settled	107
Cases jointly submitted for arbitration	11
Number of elections held	39
Cases pending	27

It should be noted that 25 cases have been transferred to other boards, of which number many have been settled but not listed as such in this report. This is exclusive of the cases over which the regional boards assume original jurisdiction.

A comparison with the report of December 21, 1933, will show the total number of cases increased 45, or nearly one a day. Thirty-five of these cases had strikes. There has also been an increase in the number of elections held and decisions rendered, the first by 18 and the latter by 15. The number of men involved in the last 45 cases was only 50,000, or an average of only 1,100 men to each case, as compared with the previous figures of 155 cases, involving 350,000 men, making an average of 2,300 men to each case.

February 21, 1934—No. 3414.

NATIONAL LABOR BOARD REPORTS TO THE PRESIDENT

Senator Robert F. Wagner today submitted to the President a statistical report summarizing the work of the National Labor Board system from its inception to February 1. The report reads:

FEBRUARY 21, 1934.

TO THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit a statistical summary of the work of the National Labor Board and of 17 of its 18 regional labor boards.

Disputes involving 914,000 workers have been before the boards, or a total of 1,818 cases, to February 1, of which 69 percent were settled. Altogether about 650,000 workers have been put back to work or kept at work, or had their less acute disputes adjusted.

Included in this total are 599 strikes, of which we have settled 80 percent, besides averting 197 more strikes—a total of 482,500 returned to work or kept at work in strike situtations.

Cases pending are 322, or 18 percent, involving 164,000. About 100,000 workers (or a flat average of 5,500 to a board) come under cases, largely of strikes which dragged on, where no definite solution could be enforced, or of disputes where some adjustment resulted whose terms were not reported to the boards.

There is a marginal area of settlements through the influence of the mere existence of the boards. Disputants have settled up because it was realized there was a tribunal to which the matter would ultimately have to go.

One half (9,636) of the settlements have been by agreement, and most agreements promise durable peace.

The boards have supervised 97 industrial elections and have had 70 cases jointly submitted for arbitration. The recent increase in arbitration cases bespeaks confidence in the boards.

Altogether the record is a testimonial to the public spirit of the boards' 250 members—all of them busy people, prominent in the affairs of their communities, whose services on the boards are voluntary.

Considered against the background of the disturbed economic conditions when the National Labor Board (Aug. 5) and the regional labor boards (October) began their work, and with the question in mind as to what might have happened had the country lacked this system of mediation and arbitration, the work has won the praise of many commentators. What this record actually reflects is the cooperative attitude and desire for industrial peace of the great majority of employers and employees, who have followed the Board's methods in the adjustment of complicated and contentious affairs. This support of the majority is very reassuring and indicates that the general principles of the boards are soundly based.

The record has a disqueting aspect. Its percentage of settlements is too low, and some settlements have been unsatisfactory. The statistics bear out what the boards in many regions have been reporting for some time; namely, that the willingness to use the boards, displayed by the majority, is encountering the impediment of a small minority whose desire for industrial peace is not uppermost

This impediment is increasing. Certain industrialists' effort to challenge the Board's authority is symptomatic. Far more significant is the fact that three quarters of all the disputes involve complaints of denial of the rights of self-organization and collective bargaining contained in section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act.

Clearer understanding and recognition of these rights and of the National Labor Board's authority seem to be the requirements of the present situation as indicated by our 6 months' experience."

ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Chairman National Labor Board.

With the report, Senator Wagner made public tabulations summarizing the disposition of cases, numbers involved, causes of complaints, etc. He paid tribute to the work of the regional boards which have been established in the following centers: Atlanta, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Minneapolis-St. Paul, Newark, New Orleans, New York City, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, San Francisco, and Seattle.

"I must direct attention", said Senator Wagner, "to a feature of these boards' quiet work that does not make headlines in newspapers. Their reports include thousands of those difficult problems known as discrimination cases. involving usually but a few men each, yet each requiring infinite patience and skill to determine the facts and to do justice. The regional labor boards reinstated a total of 6,852 workers who had been discharged for discrimination or laid off, or debarred from work for other causes which the boards found unjustified.

"Of the causes of disputes, charges of violation of section 7 (a) of National Industrial Recovery Act not only constituted the principal cause in more than half of all cases, but were corrollary in hundreds of other cases. Next come wage questions. A growing complaint is reduced weekly earnings from the shorter work week under industrial codes.

"Naturally the boards prefer agreements and foster them in every way. The recent increase in the number of settlements by board decisions is disquieting, for it is another indication of resistance to agreements, chiefly evinced by a minority of employers."

Senator Wagner said that a considerable number of reports from regional boards, which he had gone over, directed attention to the fact of "a waiting attitude" on the part of both employers and workers pending the outcome of certain cases which had been before the National Labor Board. "However," he said, "the principal impression, based on reports from New England to California, is that the overwhelming majority of employers and workers use, trust, and support this system of industrial adjustment. The President took a necessary and far-sighted step in establishing the National Labor Board."

The tabulations cover number of cases to date; cases settled; settlements which were by agreement; settlement by decision; total of workers involved in cases; workers reinstated (exclusive of strikes) in discrimination cases; cases pending; total of strikes with workers involved; total strikes settled, with workers involved; total strikes averted, with workers involved; complaints of violation of section 7–a; complaints involving wage demands; complaints involving reduced weekly earnings; number of elections; number of joint arbitrations.

(Duplication of cases involved in both regional boards and the National Board's reports are canceled out, in the weighted estimates, by a very large number of adjustments which a number of boards made without reporting them in their tabulation of "cases.")

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION (NATIONAL LABOR BOARD)

For release Monday, March 5 Release No. 3607

OVER A MILLION WORKERS INVOLVED IN NATIONAL LABOR BOARD CASES—PRESIDENT THANKS THE BOARDS

"A long step toward that ultimate goal" of peaceful settlement of all capital-labor difficulties is mentioned by the President in a letter to Senator Robert F. Wagner, made public today by the National Labor Board. The letter refers to the report to the President by the National Labor Board on the results accomplished during its first 6 months.

At the same time Senator Wagner made public a summary of the National Labor Board system's reports showing that over 1,060,000 workers had been involved in cases up to March 1.

The letter requests Senator Wagner to communicate the President's appreciation to the 250 members of the National Labor Board and its 18 regional labor boards. The boards' memberships consist half of industrial and half of labor representatives, with impartial chairmen, the service of all being voluntary.

The President's letter reads:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 26.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Thanks very much for your very comprehensive statistical summary of the work of the National Labor Board and the regional labor boards.

May I take occasion to express to you my sincere appreciation of the fine, untiring, and patriotic service you and your colleagues have rendered. The work that you have been doing is a long step toward that ultimate goal for which we are striving, that of settlement of all differences between capital and labor by peaceful means.

I would like especially too, to get to the two hundred and fifty volunteer members my deep appreciation of the sacrifice they are making in carrying on this great work.

Very sincerely yours, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The report to the President covered the work of the boards to February 1. "The reports to March 1", said Senator Wagner, "have just come in from 18 regional labor boards. A tentative summary shows that the total of workers involved in cases coming before the 18 regional and the National Labor Board is now 1,061,000 as compared with 914,000 in the report to the President. The present total of cases is 2,012 (as compared with 1,818 to February 1), and the present total of settlements is 1,377 (as compared with 1,253). The regional labor boards have had a total of 431 new cases involving 140,000 workers the past month. Of these they have settled 381 cases, or 88 percent.

"This is an improvement over the last report where the flat average of settlements for the whole system was 69 percent. In the report to the President I stated that I considered this percentage too low and pointed out that it was caused by the small majority of employers whose attitude was not that of the great majority in cooperating with the National Labor Board.

"Cases pending are 531, or 26 percent, as compared with 18 percent previously. It should be noted that the number of new cases the past month represents a heavy increase. It presages a marked increase in the number of disputes and therefore of work to be faced this spring. The stresses and strains of our national economic readjustment are by no means on the wane.

"Altogether the present report indicates that of over a million workers, whose affairs have been dealt with by the labor boards since their inception, about 775,000 have been put back to work or kept at work or had their less acute disputes adjusted."

poses", approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.), and in order to effectuate the purposes of that Act, it is hereby ordered that:

The National Labor Board, created on August 5, 1933, to "pass promptly on any case of hardship or dispute that may arise from interpretation or application of the President's Reemployment Agreement", shall continue to adjust all industrial disputes, whether arising out of the interpretation and operation of the President's Reemployment Agreement or any duly approved industrial code of fair competition, and to compose all conflicts threatening the industrial peace of the country. All action heretofore taken by this Board in the discharge of its functions is hereby approved and ratified.

The powers and functions of this Board shall be as follows:

1. To settle by mediation, conciliation, or arbitration all controversies between employers and employees which tend to impede the purposes of the National Industrial Recovery Act; provided, however, the Board may decline to take cognizance of controversies between employers and employees in any field of trade or industry where a means of settlement, provided for by agreement, industrial code, or Federal law, has not been invoked.

2. To establish local or regional boards upon which employers and employees shall be equally represented, and to delegate thereto such powers and territorial jurisdiction as the National Labor Board may determine.

3. To review the determinations of the local or regional boards where the public interest so requires.

4. To make rules and regulations governing its procedure and the discharge of its functions.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 16, 1933.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

By virtue of the authority vested in me under Title I, of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.), and in order to effectuate the policy of said Act, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, do hereby provide for and direct the enforcement of certain provisions of Section 7 (a) of said Act and the conditions contained therein, as incorporated in, and made a part of, any code of fair competition, or agreement heretofore or hereafter approved or prescribed by me in the following manner:

1. Whenever the National Labor Board shall determine in such manner as it sees fit, that a substantial number (as defined in the discretion of the Board) of the employees, or of any specific group of employees, of any plant or enterprise or industrial unit of any employer subject to such a code or agreement, have requested the Board to conduct an election to enable them to choose representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection in the exercise of the rights assured to them in said Section 7 (a), the Board shall make the arrangements for and supervise the conduct of an election, under the exclusive control of the Board and under such rules and regulations as the Board shall prescribe. Thereafter the Board shall publish promptly the names of those representatives who are selected by the vote of at least a majority of the employees voting, and have been thereby designated to represent all the employees eligible to participate in such an election for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection in their relations with their employer.

2. Whenever the National Labor Board shall have determined upon an investigation, or as the result of an election, that the majority of the employees of an employer, or the majority of any specific group of employees, have selected their representatives in accordance with the provisions of said section 7 (a), and shall have certified the names of such representatives to their employer, and thereafter upon complaint or on its own motion, the Board shall determine that such an employer has declined to recognize or to deal with said representatives, or is in any other way refusing to comply with the requirements of said section 7 (a), the Board shall report its determination promptly to the Administrator for Industrial Recovery for appropriate action.

3. The powers and duties herein conferred upon the National Labor Board are in addition to, and not in derogation of, any powers and duties conferred upon such Board by any other Executive order.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 1, 1934.

Approval recommended.

TEXT OF THE EXECUTIVE ORDER OF FEBRUARY 1, 1934, AS AMENDED FEBRUARY 23, 1934

By virtue of the authority vested in me under Title I, of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.), and in order to effectuate the policy of said Act, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, do hereby provide for and direct the enforcement of certain provisions of Section 7 (a) of said Act and the conditions contained therein, as incorporated in, and made a part of, any code of fair competition, or agreement theretofore or hereafter approved or prescribed by me in the following manner:

1. Whenever the National Labor Board shall determine, in such manner as it sees fit, that a substantial number (as defined in the discretion of the Board) of the employees, or of any specific group of employees, of any plant or enterprise or industrial unit of any employer subject to such a code or agreement, have requested the Board to conduct an election to enable them to choose representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection in the exercise of the rights assured to them in said Section 7 (a), the Board shall make the arrangements for and supervise the conduct of an election, under the exclusive control of the Board and under such rules and regulations as the Board shall prescribe. Thereafter the Board shall publish promptly the names of those representatives who are selected by the vote of at least a majority of the employees voting, and have been thereby designated to represent all the employees eligible to participate in such an election for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection in their relations with their employers.

2. Whenever the National Labor Board shall find that an employer has interfered with the Board's conduct of an election or has declined to recognize or bargain collectively with a representative or representatives of the employees adjudged by the Board to have been selected in accordance with Section 7 (a) or has otherwise violated or is refusing to comply with said Section 7 (a), the Board, in its discretion, may report such findings and make appropriate recommendations to the Attorney General or to the Compliance Division of the National Recovery Administration. The Compliance Division shall not review the findings of the Board but it shall have power to take appropriate action based thereon.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 23, 1934.
Modified February 23, 1934.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Mr. Slichter here?

Mr. Robert L. Hale, professor of law at Columbia University.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT L. HALE, PROFESSOR OF LAW AT COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hale, I understand you would like to be heard today so you will not have to remain in Washington until tomorrow morning.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Hale, we will be glad to hear you. What is your full name?

Mr. HALE. Robert L. Hale.

The CHAIRMAN. And your profession?

Mr. HALE. Associate professor at Columbia University.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you hold any public position?

Mr. HALE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you interested in this legislation?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to have your views about this bill.

Mr. HALE. I am heartily in accord with the main purpose of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you, for the record, please, give us your background, your interest in public affairs, your law research work?

Mr. HALE. I have been teaching a law course in industrial relations, and I am somewhat familiar with the cases in the courts dealing with it.

The CHAIRMAN. You have specialized on the interpretations of industrial relations by the courts?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner vouches for your standing as a high-grade lawyer.

Mr. HALE. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, please.

Mr. HALE. I am heartily in favor of the general purposes of the bill. I think there are certain objections which a great many people raise to any bill of this kind, which perhaps ought to be mentioned briefly.

There is frequently a great deal of talk to the effect that a closed shop destroys the freedom of the worker to be independent of a union if he wishes to be. Well, to a certain extent, of course, it does, but in a complicated modern society like ours, nobody is going to be entirely free. If a man wants to work in a steel plant, he does not just go out and work according to his own ideas about how it should be worked; he has to join an organization. Normally, in the case of a steel plant, he becomes an employee of a steel company, and then he has no freedom as to the details of his work whatever; he is a nonvoting member of a society. Now, if he belongs to a union in a closed-shop industry, it is perfectly true he has no freedom to work without being a member of the union, but he has a little more freedom through the brotherhood of his union against the restraint imposed upon him by the employer.

Now, of course, any system of organization is liable to have faults at times. A union itself may possibly have faults, and sometimes it has been oppressive of its members, but it is in any event a choice between evils. Government of any sort has certain evils, or may have at particular times, but the only alternative is anarchy, where the evils would be much greater. If he is subject to be governed by the rules of his union he presumably has a little more control over what those rules are than if he is governed solely by the rules laid down by his employer. So I think the moment you reflect a little bit on that notion of individual freedom, you see that it breaks down.

Now, another objection that will be raised will be as to the constitutional rights of the employer under this bill. There are two parts of the Constitution which will undoubtedly, I presume, if this bill is passed, be raised, at some time or another, in the courts. One is as to whether the Federal Government is taking over powers which belong properly to the States, and the other is, where that is not the case, is it depriving the employer of liberty or property without due process of law, contrary to the fifth amendment?

Now, on the Federal-State proposition, I am not in a position to say very much. If you look at the document, the constitutional document—I mean the paper, the Constitution—there is nothing in there which would tell you one way or another whether this was a usurpation of State powers. Congress has power to regulate interstate commerce. Now we know under court decisions that they sometimes can regulate intrastate railroad rates if those will have a bearing on interstate rates.

Now we know the court has made certain other limitations, but as I say, I am not familiar with all the decisions, but as far as the language of the Constitution goes a court would be free to interpret this one way or the other, insofar as it affects an industry which is engaged in the manufacturing business within the State, with the idea of shipping its goods to other States later. But now the fifth amendment question will come in. If it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to discriminate against union men, and if that is penalized, or the board is given power to go to a court to get an injunction against it, why the question will be raised as to two cases which have been decided some years ago by the Supreme Court, Adair v. The United States (205 U.S. 161), and Coppage v. Kansas (236 U.S. 1). In those cases, by a divided court, by a division among the judges, the majority of the court held that the employer had a constitutional right to fire a man for any reason he wanted, and to insist, as a condition of his employment, that he sign what has been called a "yellow dog" contract, and the court there said to take away that right, at least to make it a crime to do that, was contrary to the fifth or fourteenth amendment, depending on whether it was the Federal Government or the State.

Now, I think it is fairly good evidence that the court has changed its views on that since then. In Coppage v. Kansas there were two dissenting opinions, one written by Justice Holmes and the second one written by Justices Day and Hughes, where they dissented seriously from the proposition that that kind of law was unconstitutional, and the general philosophy of the Day-Hughes opinion was that the purpose of this statute was not so much to interfere with the right of the employer as it was to protect the right of the employee to join a union, and the Congress or the State, as the case might be, had full power to protect that right by making it a crime for the employer to interfere with it through his right to discharge.

Well, that was a dissenting opinion; but in 1930, in the case of the Texas-New Orleans Railroad v. Brotherhood of Clerks (281 U.S. 548), the opinion was rendered by Chief Justice Hughes, and there was no dissent, Mr. Justice McReynolds took no part in the proceedings, but he did not dissent; otherwise the court was unanimous.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that opinion recite the views of Mr. Justice Hughes when he was a single justice before his resignation?

Mr. HALE. In effect it did. It insinuated the same philosophy, although Justice Hughes was careful to say that he was not overruling Adair v. United States or Coppage v. Kansas, because he said this was not aimed at the right of the employer, the railroad company in that case, to discharge, but it was aimed to protect the right of the union, of the men to select their own representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining.

Well, the same thing, of course, was true in Coppage v. Kansas. I mean, we all know when a judge says he isn't overruling a case that it isn't inconsistent, that the court is not quite ready to repudiate it flatly, but when the distinction is one which is so exceedingly thin it indicates a tendency on the part of the court to limit those cases at least to the most narrow statement possible of their facts.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, the court sometimes says it is not overruling when it is actually overruling.

Mr. HALE. Yes. Except you are not permitted to argue in the court later that the case has been flatly rejected. Sometimes the court does flatly reject a case, quite frequently it happens, but at many other times without flatly rejecting it it distinguishes it so that there is no life left in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Supreme Court can complain as well as the Senators.

Mr. HALE. Justice Hughes in that case said it would be a mockery. I can get his exact words here. He talks about the right of representation and then he said:

> Courts are not required to ignore this right of the employees but could safeguard it and seek to make their appropriate collective action an instrument of peace rather than of strife. Such collective action would be a mockery if representation were made futile by interferences with freedom of choice.

That is exactly what Day and Hughes said in the Coppage case, that the right to join a union, which Justice Pitney for the majority recognized as existing, and they said the right is a mockery if the employer could make the exercise of it impossible.

Senator DAVIS. Just a minute.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Senator DAVIS. I would take it for granted that you are in accord with the thought that the signing of what is known as the "yellow dog" contract would take us back to the feudal system.

Mr. HALE. Yes. I am not sure that I am putting it in exactly those words, because I am not quite sure what the feudal system was, but it is a good working phrase.

Senator WAGNER. Congress has declared itself only lately on that question.

Mr. HALE. Yes; in the Norris Act.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Now there is a further thing. Section 303 I think is very important to be retained, that "nothing in this bill shall be taken to diminish," I am quoting from memory, "the right to strike." It is conceivable, of course, that if a board passes on all things we do not know 15 or 20 years from now what sort of membership will be on that board, and if the union is absolutely precluded from striking against it you might have a pretty dangerous situation.

Senator DAVIS. But the right is not denied in the bill.

Mr. HALE. No; that is why I say it is very important to leave that section in, 303, because if it is not left in I think there is real danger that a number of judges, particularly in the lower courts, will construe it as if the setting up of this machinery made strikes improper, in fact, illegal. In fact, a great many courts, lower courts in New York, New Jersey, and elsewhere, have suggested that strikes under the N. R. A. are illegal. Why, you can search the statutes with a fine-tooth comb and you won't find anything, but judges may be able to find what you and I could not.

Now there are certain very important details in this bill which I think call for a change. There is one detail which is material, or one word which I think emasculates this bill entirely, if it stays, or at least would be an invitation to a court to emasculate it.

You all recall the history of the Clayton Act, what happened to it in the courts.

Senator DAVIS. Will you call our attention to that particular word?

Mr. HALE. Section 4, on page 4 of the bill, at the bottom, says that "Employees shall have the right to organize and join labor organizations", and so forth. Section 5 defines unfair labor practices, and paragraph 1 states:

> To attempt by interference, influence, restraint, favor, coercion, or lock-out, or by any other means, to impair the right of employees guaranteed in section 4.

That is a dangerously ambiguous word. A court could well say, as Justice Pitney said, you remember, in the Coppage case, Justice Pitney said, certainly, the employee has the right to join a union, but the employer is not impairing that right, or is not infringing it when he makes him sign a contract that he won't join. I have a right to sell goods to you, but you are not impairing that right if you do not buy. So a court, which is so inclined, might well say, "Certainly I am not going to let an employer impair the right of an employee to organize, but when he tells the employee he won't employ him if he exercises it, that is not impairing it."

A very simple change would satisfy that.

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We must leave at once to vote in the Senate on the St. Lawrence Waterway.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I suggest the secretary take charge of the meeting and you continue your statement. It will be then in the record. That will obviate the necessity of your waiting until our return.

Mr. HALE. All right.

Senator WAGNER. What was that word?

Mr. HALE. "To impair."

The CHAIRMAN. The witness will go on with his testimony. The secretary will preside until I return.

Mr. HALE. There are two more rather vital changes, I think, that are required. Judge Panken has suggested to me that instead of having "prevent the exercise of the right", to make it "interfere with the exercise of the right."

The SECRETARY. What page is that?

Mr. HALE. Page 5, section 5, paragraph 1.

The SECRETARY. What is your suggested amendment?

Mr. HALE. "To attempt by interference", and so forth, "or by any other means to interfere with the exercise of." Then the court would not be free to say, "Well, you are not impairing."

The SECRETARY. "Interfere by the exercise?"

Mr. HALE. "Interfere with the exercise of the right of employees."

The SECRETARY. That is in place of "by interference?"

Mr. HALE. No, I am leaving the "interference," although that does make it kind of redundant there, it is not very artistic. It should read, "to attempt by interference, influence, restraint, favor, coercion, or lock-out, or by any other means, to interfere with the exercise of the right." In fact, I think you could strike out the "interference", because you are saying it all over again.

There is a second thing about the legality of the clause in reference to the closed shop, there is something about the legality of the closed shop under section 7(a) and under this act. Section 7(a), as you know, makes it somewhat doubtful whether a closed-shop agreement is legal, because it says

Every code shall

shall contain the following conditions: * * * (2) That no employee and no one seeking employment shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join any company union or to refrain from joining, organizing, or assisting a labor organization of his own choosing.

Now, if there is no other union except the union which is trying to order the closed shop, that does not prevent it, as far as I can see, because it does not say you must not make it a condition that he join a regular union, not a company union, but it does say you must not make it a condition that he does not join. Supposing you have a union representing 0.9 of the people there and another union representing 0.1, and the union representing 0.9 signs a contract with the employer for a closed shop, that they have got to join that major union, well, by doing that, they are promising not to join this minority union. That is contrary to section 7 (a).

Now, does this act cure that? Well, it does not, and it ought to. The only thing on that is this: On page 5, at the bottom, paragraph 6—this is one of the unfair labor practices—it says,

To engage in any discriminatory practice as to wage or hour differentials, advancement, demotion, hire, tenure of employment, reinstatement, or any other condition of employment which encourages membership or nonmembership in any labor organization: Provided, That where a contract or agreement of any kind is or shall be in force between an employer and a group of employees the provisions of such contract or agreement regarding conditions of employment shall not, because of anything contained in this paragraph, compel an employer to observe similar conditions of employment in his relations with all his employees: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall preclude an employer and a labor organization from agreeing that a person seeking employment shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join such labor organization, if no attempt is made to influence such labor organization by any unfair labor practice, if such labor organization is composed of at least a majority of such employers' employees, and if the said agreement does not cover a period in excess of 1 year.

Now nothing in this act prevents it, but something in 7 (a) prevents it. Now that clause in 7 (a) is not repealed by this act, and it ought to be. There is a provision in this act that anything in section A which conflicts with this act is hereby repealed, but that does not conflict with anything in this act. There ought to be something in this act which will conflict with that in section 7 (a), so as to repeal it. So it ought to have provided that nothing in this act and nothing in any act of the United States, or possibly nothing in any code, shall preclude an employer and a labor organization——

The SECRETARY. That is line 7?

Mr. HALE. Yes; beginning at line 7.

The SECRETARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Now one of those "ifs" there is a little broad too.

If such labor organization is composed of at least a majority of such employers' employees.

Suppose you have the United States Steel Co. running seven steel mills and also running one or two captive mines. Suppose they were compelled by pressure of the union to sign a closed-shop agreement on a captive mine. Well, that would be discriminating against people who did not belong in the union, and that union would not represent a majority of all the employees of the United States Steel Co. It ought to be enough if it represents a majority of all the employees affected by the agreement, which would be very simple to insert.

The SECRETARY. Where would you put that in the section?

Mr. HALE. In lines 12 and 13, where it says,

If such labor organization is composed of at least a majority of such employers' employees, who are affected by the agreement.

The SECRETARY. Insert "who are affected by the agreement"?

Mr. HALE. Yes. There is another question which raises a broad question of policy and not a matter of interpretation—that is, under this bill—if any employer engages in one of these unfair labor practices the only remedy you have is before the Board.

Now, under the Railroad Labor Act, if the railroad is interfering with the choice of representatives, the union can go directly into court and get an injunction against the railroad. That is what they did in the Texas and New Orleans case, but here there apparently is no private remedy. You have got to bring your case before the board, and the board deals with matters from all over the country, and it is only if the board grants relief that anything more can be done about it, and the thing that can be done is the Board will issue an order. That is not enough. The employer may disobey the order. Then there are two orders. The Board can go to the Federal district attorney and ask him to seek an injunction, or it can bring direct proceedings for enjoining compliance with the order, but if the Board is too busy to do that—and I do not see how it could fail to be, being the only court—for instance, if every right you had under the Federal law had to go to the Supreme Court before you get anything, there would be such an impossible congestion of business that you would not get anywhere. You go now to a local court and you have a right to appeal to the Supreme Court, but in a great many cases there is no appeal taken, so the court is not loaded with all these matters; but this Board would be, and obviously its calendars would get congested. You take the Weirton and Budd case, prolonged not only in this rather disappointing way, where they have been thundered at and slapped on the wrist, but indefinitely for years maybe. We don't know, we don't know who will be on the Board. It seems to me there ought to be some further remedy that a private person can take.

In that connection there is a statement that anybody who is aggrieved by a judgment of the Board can go into court. That is on page 13, section E. It says, "Any person aggrieved by an order of the Board may obtain a review."

Now, suppose a labor union goes to the Board and complains about the employer, and the Board decides in favor of the employer. Now it would look from that as if the labor union would be aggrieved and could appeal to the court, but the court will not interpret it right, I think, because in the Interstate Commerce Commission Act, if the Interstate Commerce Commission grants an order against the railroad, the railroad cannot appeal, but if the Interstate Commerce Commission on the complaint of a shipper refuses to take any action whatever, that is, if it decides wholly in favor of the railroad, in that case it is called a negative order, and the Supreme Court has worked out a principle in interpreting that statute, that there is no appeal from a negative order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, that could be easily altered by saying, "Any person aggrieved by an order of the Board, or by the failure of the Board to issue an order." Then, if the Board happened to side with the employer, the employee could have an appeal, just as the employer would have an appeal now, if the Board sides in favor of the employee.

Now there is another thing of very vital consequence which also goes beyond any question of the language, and that is on pages 18 and 19. The Board is given immense power, and I just want to raise the question whether possibly that is too much. At the bottom of page 18, it says, "In any dispute as to who are the representatives of employees, the Board, if the dispute might burden or affect commerce, or obstruct the free flow of commerce, may investigate such dispute and certify to the parties in writing, the name or names of the individuals or labor organizations that have been designated and authorized to represent employees."

Now they may take a secret ballot, but they do not have to. Suppose your Board consisted of some employers, some public representatives, who had risen high in politics, and some labor representatives, who were connected with one particular union; suppose you had a situation such as you had 15 or 20 years ago in the men's clothing trade. There was a union, the United Garment Workers Union, which belonged to the A. F. of L. and it was not functioning. A new union was started, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, which was not until this year affiliated with the A. F. of L. If this law had been in force at that time, and if the Board had been dominated by A. F. of L. people on the labor side, they would undoubtedly have said, or they would have made a finding that the representation of the workers in the garment trade was the United Garment Workers Union, and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers would have been still-born, and you would have had a union which really did not function.

Now that is a good deal of power to give a Board if they can just destroy any union, even if it may happen to represent a majority of the people, because the Board is not confined to that. And secondly, if the Board does say that the X.Y.Z. union represents the employees in this case—suppose a lot of people working in that trade are not admitted to membership in the X.Y.Z. union, well, then, if the X.Y.Z. union represents labor, these people who are not allowed to enter it because of moral discrimination, or because they are not pleasing to the people in control of the union, or for political reasons, will have to be represented by someone that does not really represent them.

Now I have no opinion as to how that should be fixed up. This power might be used for very beneficial purposes, and I can see great difficulties in trying to surround it by safeguards without amasculating it too much, but I think that ought to be considered.

That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you got a brief with the amendments prepared in it?

Mr. HALE. I have just given these amendments here orally.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all, Mr. Hale?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to apologize to you for the necessity for the Senators hastily departing, because of the unexpected vote on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty.

Mr. HALE. I quite understand.

The CHAIRMAN. I am very much pleased, and the committee will be that you have completed your statement so we will have a complete record of your views. My secretary informs me you have suggested some amendments to the bill.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they been submitted?

Mr. HALE. The clerk has them.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they been submitted in regular form?

Mr. HALE. I have not written them out.

The CHAIRMAN. It is just a suggested idea?

Mr. HALE. In some cases I did suggest the language.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. HALE. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. S. H. Slichter. Doctor, can you remain over until tomorrow morning, or would you prefer to go on now in order that the record may have your views?

Dr. SLICHTER. I am afraid, Senator, that I must be in the Middle West tomorrow morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, then. I will be pleased to preside, although many of the committee members are absent because of their necessity of being on the floor of the Senate. I will continue the hearing, so the record will have your views for the information of the Senators later.

STATEMENT OF DR. SUMNER SLICHTER, PROFESSOR OF ECONOMICS, HARVARD UNIVERSITY

The CHAIRMAN. May we have your full name?

Mr. SLICHTER. Sumner Slichter.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Dr. SLICHTER. Cambridge, Mass.

The CHAIRMAN. You are professor of economics at Harvard University?

Dr. SLICHTER. Yes, the Harvard Business School.

The CHAIRMAN. The Harvard Business School?

Dr. SLICHTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, are there any public activities or any other special subjects or studies that you have made that you would be willing to have recorded in the record?

Dr. SLICHTER. Perhaps I should add, Mr. Chairman, that my job the Business School is in the field of industrial relations. I have acted from time to time as arbitrator in labor disputes.

The CHAIRMAN. But your special subject at Harvard Business School is what?

Dr. SLICHTER. Industrial relations, labor problems.

The CHAIRMAN. Industrial relations?

Dr. SLICHTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed to give us your views on the pending bill.

Dr. SLICHTER. In general, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill. In fact, it seems to me to be a bill which ought to arouse very little controversy. Its basic policy, if I understand it correctly, is to prevent the growth of employer-dominated unions. I have been trying to find some of these employer-dominated unions, and I have talked with many employers, and thus far I have been unable to discover a single employer who admits that he has an employer-dominated union. In fact, every employer with whom I have talked has been outspoken in expressing the principle—the belief in the principle that employees organizations should be entirely independent of employer control. So I should be greatly surprised were any employer to appear and oppose this bill, except in matters of detail.

The CHAIRMAN. In matters of what, please?

Dr. SLICHTER. Matters of detail. My remarks will not be long and will be divided in two parts. First of all I should like to offer some—well, perhaps you may call them destructive criticisms of the bill, and then I should like to attempt to put something in their place, to suggest something to take the place of the sections which I shall criticize. My attention has been primarily focused upon section 5, which appears on page 5 of the bill.

It seems to me that this section is perhaps based on a misconception of the present situation in industrial relations, and if enacted in its present form there would be considerable danger that this section would prematurely freeze the situation which would be and which ought to be permitted to remain in flux.

To begin with, notice paragraph 2 of section 5, which reads:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice to refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees, or to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

The first part of that section does not seem to me to be open to exception, but if the entire section were enacted, it would probably result in a rush on the part of employers to enter into agreements with existing company unions. After all, the company union problem is not simply a problem of preventing the formation of new company unions. It is a problem of maintaining fair competition between the company unions which exist and other organizations.

I do not like the latter part of that section anyway, because it seems to me to be merely the expression of a pious wish and I do not like the notion of merely putting pious wishes into statutes. It says, "to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements."

You cannot make it a definite duty of a man to try to agree. He can always say he tried to agree. The words are rather meaningless. You might almost enact that the lions and lambs shall not fail to exert every reasonable effort to lie down together.

I drop those words altogether, not merely because they are meaningless, but because I feel quite certain they would precipitate a vast number of agreements between employers on the one hand and organizations on the other, which, in fact, are really not independent, and yet which no one can prove by objective evidence are dominated by employers.

The CHAIRMAN. I think your objection is well taken. Have you any language to suggest as a substitute?

Dr. SLICHTER. No. I should simply curtail the paragraph (2), retain the words "to refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees," and leave it there.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you later, Doctor, sometime while this legislation is pending before the Committee give us the language which you think might be substituted for these criticisms which you are making?

Dr. SLICHTER. Yes, I have a rough draft here which I shall introduce in more constructive parts of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be most helpful.

Dr. SLICHTER. Now, paragraph (3).

The CHAIRMAN. Still on page 5?

Dr. SLICHTER. On section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Dr. SLICHTER (reading):

> To initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, bylaws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization.

This paragraph seems to me in some respects to be meaningless and ineffective and in other respects to go too far. There are four verbs that evidently apply to each of the seven objects, which means that the section prohibits or declares it to be an unfair labor practice for an employer to influence the policy of any labor organization. Well, now, that is what collective bargaining is, an attempt on each side to influence the policies of the other, and far from it being a bad thing, that is generically, for the employer to attempt to influence the policies of the labor organization, I should say that is a good thing. That is what bargaining is. It is difficult for me to see the logic of that.

It is equally a part of bargaining for the labor organization to attempt to influence the policies of the employer. That is why they organize, so they will be more effective in influencing his policies.

So, in prohibiting employers from attempting to influence the policies of labor organizations, you are virtually taking the heart out of collective bargaining.

In other respects, that section impresses me as being meaningless and ineffective. I doubt if it would have any importance, whether it would have any important practical effect. To be concrete, it prohibits employers from initiating the formation of a labor organization. Well, how is an employer to be prevented from initiating the formation of a labor organization? The prohibition is in very broad terms. It reads "directly or indirectly." But as far as the employer is concerned, suppose he, or his superintendents, or his foremen, say to some of the men, "Why don't you fellows get together and get some kind of committees to handle your affairs with us? Men in other plants round about are doing it, why don't you do it?" And the employees get together. The employer has made it evident he is not going to object if they do. And in that change of atmosphere they respond quite promptly and they start committees of their own. Has the employer initiated a labor organization?

Well, he is hauled before the National Labor Board and accused of having initiated a labor organization. His answer obviously is, "Why no, the men started it. We suggested it, it is true." His suggestion that it would be a good thing for the men to organize, is that initiating a labor organization? I see no objective line that can be drawn, and consequently I see no way in which that word "initiate" can acquire effective meaning.

Even the prohibition against the employer supervising the elections. Any labor organization with which I am in entire sympathy, is, as a practical proposition, of very little meaning, it seems to me, because the employer can always act through employees, and you cannot put your finger on his actions and say, "Well, he is violating the law because the law says 'directly or indirectly' and he is acting indirectly." You cannot put your finger on what he is doing.

It has been the tactics of employers recently, after getting into trouble, before the Labor Board, apparently to withdraw, but in an effort to encourage the employees to take the initiative and hold elections, it has pursued those tactics, and the Labor Board apparently has found it is rather helpless in meeting those tactics.

So I do not conceive of paragraph (3) as of much help. I think the word "policies" in the last line should certainly be eliminated, and I do not think it would make much difference in the law if the whole paragraph were eliminated, though I am in sympathy with what the paragraph is trying to do in most cases.

It should be observed, however, that there are some instances in which it is entirely legitimate for an employer to initiate the labor organization. Suppose men do not act themselves? Suppose they do not feel like joining an outside labor organization? And in some instances dues in the outside labor organizations, the dues are so high that men, after 4 years of depression, do not feel like paying those dues. That is particularly true in instances where you have to buy a lot of insurance at the same time that you become a member of a labor organization. Selling a man membership in the labor organization is selling him insurance at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a frequent occurrence?

Dr. SLICHTER. It is only a minority of the organizations in the American Federation of Labor which have compulsory insurance, but some of them do. I do not care to be understood as necessarily criticising those insurance schemes, because that is a complicated problem in itself, but I am directing attention to the fact that there are circumstances under which the employer, with perfect propriety, it seems to me, may initiate a labor organization among his employees. Were that section retained, I wonder whether the courts would feel disposed to uphold the rule defining as an unfair labor practice the initiation of a labor organization by an employer under any circumstances.

There may be two conflicting and competing labor organizations in the employer's plant, and it may be that situation which leads him to take some initiative and try to introduce an organization which would comprehend both of the others.

There is competition in the automobile industry at the present time, in some plants, between three labor organizations, one a company union, one the A. F. of L. union, and one an independent union. Now, if the section meant a great deal, my disposition would be to say, let it remain and let the few employers who would suffer from it, suffer, but I do not think it means very much of anything.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an attempt to suppress domination and control by an employer who wants to organize a union for his own selfish ends.

Dr. SLICHTER. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. And in doing that, it prevents a well-meaning and altruistic employer from trying to direct and guide his employees in organizing a worthwhile and sound organization, isn't that true?

Dr. SLICHTER. Yes; I believe it is. Now, Mr. Chairman, up to this point, I have been entirely destructive. I should like to attempt to offer something in place of the criticisms that I have made.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the bill can be improved in a great many particulars without injuring the objective.

Dr. SLITCHER. Perhaps I should add this before passing on to the constructive phase. In section (4), or in paragraph (4) of section 5, it reads:

> To contribute financial or other material support to any labor organization, by compensating anyone for services performed in behalf of any labor organization, or by any other means whatsoever.

I venture to suggest a saving clause at the end of that section reading somewhat as follows:

> Except that nothing herein shall prevent employee representatives in the service of the company from drawing their regular rate of pay for committee work done within regular working hours.

There has been a great deal of committee work done within regular working hours, and it has been customary for the man who has been taken away from the bench or the machine, to get his regular rate of pay while doing that committee work. That has been true in union shops as well as in nonunion shops, and I see no reason for disturbing that situation, which section (4) might do, or paragraph (4), might do, if narrowly interpreted. Now to pass on to the constructive suggestions. The problem which impresses me as overwhelmingly important is not the one of preventing the formation of the so-called "company union", because as a practical matter I do not believe that can be done. I think the employer who makes the suggestion, "Well, boys, you certainly ought to have a committee to look after your interest," you can always do that, you can always create committees and deal with them, so the problem is not preventing that action. It cannot be done, even if it were desirable to do it.

But the problem is giving the independent labor organizations a fair opportunity to compete with the employee committees and to provide a method by which, in an impartial manner, the wishes, the preferences of the employees can be ascertained, and in particular to prevent the employer from showing an undue preference in dealing with various competing committees, because where there is a company union and a trade union in the same plant, each trying to deal with the employer, the way the employer is likely to behave is simply this: He meets any committee which wishes to talk over things with him, he is very nice to them, and does not hesitate to discuss conditions in his shop with them, but he has a choice, he indicates that he is going to make concessions, and in case he is going to make those concessions, he has his choice as to which committee will get the concessions. The great weapon of the employer in maintaining the fidelity of company unions as against trade unions is in letting those men be the ones who bring home the bacon. If you study the history of the formation of company unions on the railroads; you will find that is the way in many instances in which the trade union was undermined. The trade union could not get concessions and the employee committee could.

So, in my judgment, the problem is one of determining who has the right to represent the employees and placing some restrictions upon the dealings of the employer with other persons.

This is what I suggest, in a very rough form. I have plagiarized rather liberally the President's recent order authorizing the National Labor Board to hold elections, but it is not 100 percent plagiarization.

Whenever either the employer or a substantial number of the employees, as defined in the discretion of the National Labor Board, of any plant or industrial unit of any employer shall question the right of any persons to represent the employees in collective bargaining, the Board may take appropriate steps to determine who are the representatives of the employees.

In doing so the Board may, in its discretion, conduct an election either under the exclusive control of the Board or with the cooperation of the interested parties, and under such rules and regulations as the Board shall prescribe. Thereafter the Board shall publish primarily the names of those representatives who are selected by the vote of at least the majority of the employees voting. Whenever the National Labor Board shall have determined, upon investigation, or as the result of an election, who are the representatives of the majority of the employees of any employer, or of the majority of any specific group of employees in his employ, the Board shall certify the names to the employer, who shall immediately post the names on bulletin boards throughout the plant.

After certification of representatives of employees by the National Labor Board, it shall be an unfair labor practice for the employer, at any time within a year of the election, to bargain with other persons purporting to represent the employees, without submitting any agreements to the certified representatives, either for approval or for further negotiation, and no agreement governing wages, hours, or working conditions made within 1 year of the certification of employee representatives by the National Labor Board shall be binding on the employees, unless approved by the certified representatives.

If I may interject here, it seems to me futile to undertake to specify, as paragraph (2) does that two sides shall make a reasonable effort to agree, but it is possible to say that the employer must not make agreements with persons who are not representatives of his employees, unless those representtttives have first an opportunity to ratify the agreement or to go to the employer and say, "No, this is not satisfactory; we must have this, that, and the other changed."

I would add to the section the following:

On receiving complaints from a substantial number of employees in any plant, or industrial union of any employer, that the employer is bargaining collectively with persons who are not representatives of the employees, the National Labor Board may, in its discretion, order the employer and the alleged representatives to cease and desist from negotiating agreements pending determination by the National Labor Board of the persons who are representatives of the employees.

The danger is that the employer will rush in the agreement with persons who represent no one, and then when an independent organization undertakes to bargain, the employer will say, "I am sorry, but I am bound by an agreement. I might consider dealing with you, but this agreement ties my hands. You know you have always stood for the sacredness of agreements. You live up to your own agreements, and I must live up to mine."

Finally, I think that there ought to be a modest retroactive feature to this part of the bill reading somewhat as follows:

> If within 3 months of an election, within 3 months prior to an election, held under the authority of the National Labor Board, the employer shall have negotiated an agreement with persons whom the National Labor Board finds are not authorized to represent the employees, the Board may, upon petition of the certified representatives, order an abrogation of the agreement, and the agreement shall no longer be binding upon the employees. Notice of such abrogation shall be posted by the employer within the plant.

Now that, Mr. Chairman, completes the constructive suggestions which I have to offer. They are based, as I said before, upon the conviction that it is both futile and unwise to attempt to tie the employer's hands completely in starting organizations among his employees, but it is sound policy to expose any organizations which exist to prevent fair competition and to prevent any organization from initiating collective agreements in cases where a substantial number of employees question the right of its personnel to represent them.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think limitations should be put upon industries affected by this bill so as to prevent industries with only a few employees from being subjected to its provisions?

Dr. SLICHTER. I should hesitate very much, Mr. Chairman, to approve of such a limit, although its administrative convenience is obvious. Some of our worst labor problems are in industries such as branches of the needle trades, where most of the plants are exceedingly small, the plants may be small and yet the number of employees involved may be large because it may be a simultaneous affair affecting dozens of the small plants. I do not think that the same considerations apply in this kind of an act as would apply in an act for unemployment reserves where you get into a large amount of book work for small concerns. After all, the National Labor Board would presumably handle minor disputes through examiners much as the Interstate Commerce Commission handles minor rate cases through examiners.

Mr. HANDLER. We have experienced cases where it would have been relatively easy to have reached a satisfactory agreement between the parties to the dispute but no agreement was reached because of the competition of the small plants with bad labor conditions prevailing in them, whom we were unable to make parties to the agreement, so that I should think that the exemptions might cause considerable difficulty.

Dr. SLICHTER. I should like to conclude, if there are no further questions, Mr. Chairman, with this observation:

I heard the Secretary of Labor this morning suggest that the contemplated Labor Board be placed under the Department of Labor. With all due respect to the Department of Labor, if it were to be placed under any department I should say that would be the last place to put it because the Department of Labor, quite properly, is looked upon as the guardian of the interests of the wage earners. It is intended to be a partisan Department in a way, and, rightly or wrongly it will always be regarded as more partisan than it actually is, so it would diminish the prestige of the Labor Board and impair its usefulness if it were placed under that Department.

As a matter of fact, I do not quite catch the importance of putting the Board in any Department, but the strategy of it, if it were to be placed under any department, would seem to me to dictate that it go in the Department of Commerce, because, after all, it is going to be mainly a protector of the rights of labor and its effectiveness is going to depend primarily upon its prestige with the employers and the way to give it that effectiveness would be to place it in the Department of Commerce. I do not think, however, there is any particular reason, any compelling reason, for placeing it under any Department, and I like to regard it as an independent agency comparable to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. You have been most helpful and I want you to know the committee appreciates very much your giving us the benefit of your well thought-out views. You may feel free also, Doctor, to write us any suggestions that you may have on further study of the bill.

Dr. SLICHTER. Thank you very much.

(Whereupon, at 1:30 p.m., the committee adjourned until 10 a.m. to-morrow, Thursday, March 15, 1934.)

TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1934

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met at 10 a.m., pursuant to adjournment, in room 335, Senate Office Building, Senator David I. Walsh presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Thomas, Borah, Walcott, and Davis.

Also present: Senator Robert F. Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The meeting will come to order, please.

Mr. Green.

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have you address the committee.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM GREEN, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appear this morning in behalf of the American Federation of Labor, in support of Senate bill 2926, introduced by Senator Wagner. I ask for the privilege of offering some amendments to the bill, which I hope may be favorably considered.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have you do so.

Mr. GREEN. But I wish to assure the committee that the American Federation of Labor stands wholeheartedly and unreservedly behind Senator Wagner in support of this bill. I understand that the bill introduced by Congressman Connery is a companion bill and is practically the same as the bill introduced by Senator Wagner.

It might be appropriate for me to say that it is the opinion of labor that this measure is of tremendous importance. We have learned through experience during the last few months the necessity of the enactment of a measure of this kind. We believe that if labor is to be free, economically and industrially free, and is to enjoy the rights guaranteed labor as declared in section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act, that it is necessary to enact this Wagner bill into law.

I am further of the opinion that this bill will be bitterly opposed by many employers of labor, by the manufacturers' associations, and by the organizations of employers who are known to be uncompromisingly hostile to the bona fide trade union movement as represented by the American Federation of Labor. But labor asks for this bill. It believes that it ought to have the right to identify itself with an organization of its own choosing and to be represented in negotiations with employers by its own chosen representatives selected free from coercion and intimidation. It asks that labor be placed upon a basis of equality with industry and with the employers of labor.

It can only be placed upon that basis of equality when it is accorded the right to organize and select its own agency through which the workers may collectively bargain. It opposes paternalism as reflected and represented by company unions. It objects and protests against being placed in a position of inferiority, and that is the position in which it is placed when it is compelled to accept company unions, organized, formed, fostered, financed, and maintained by the company.

The labor disputes act is proposed to facilitate realization of the purposes of the National Recovery Act. It is intended to further the permanent interests not only of labor, but of industry and the general public. It seeks to give concrete expression to the spirit of the National Recovery Act, by establishing for producing workers that status that would enable them to meet employers upon an equal footing necessary for collective bargaining.

The functional factors concerned in business—investors, producers, buyers—must be equally prepared to promote their interests if we are to have that balance in business which will assure sustained production and consumption. One of the major causes of the industrial collapse of 1929 was the inability of wage earners and small salaried persons to participate proportionately in the increased wealth produced through technical progress. Prices and production both depend upon capacity of consumers to buy and use. If the largest group of consumers—the wage earners—make more than 66⅔ percent of the purchases in retail markets—if they were in a position to maintain their incomes at a level that would absorb the output of industry, we would have operating a condition essential for balance in distribution and regularity in production. That condition is that workers be given industrial status that makes possible bargaining power equal to that of their employers.

The National Recovery Act frees trade associations from restraints formerly imposed by anti-trust laws and assures them opportunity for industrial self-government. Industrial management has gained a priceless opportunity for self-government and can demonstrate its long-boasted capacity to manage industry for the best interests of all concerned. Since the power of government has been definitely increased, it is of the utmost importance that labor have that status that will provide equality in bargaining. That status rests upon recognized and accepted right to organize and to negotiate collective agreements. Section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act was intended to assure the right to organize and to bargain collectively and 7 (b) charged the President with the duty of encouraging collective bargaining.

Now the right to organize in organizations of their choosing, free from employers' interference, as the President recently declared, means just what it says. But employers have shown their unwillingness for employees to have equal rights with them or even rights that would substantially better their conditions. The general counsel for the National Association of Manufacturers who has been the relentless foe of the principle of union organization for two decades, now seeks to show that provisions to assure free choice to workers is special privilege. Any such charge ignores the obvious organized effort of employers to substitute "unions" planned and controlled by the company for standard labor unions, in an effort to appear to conform to the labor provisions of the National Recovery Act without in any material detail losing their control over conditions and terms of work. The company union is an agency developed by management for the purpose of more effectively dealing with employees to accomplish management's purposes. It is so organized and operated that the employers' control over jobs is all pervading. The situation now resolves itself into this form. The law says employees have the right to organize. Shall they control their own organizations, or shall employers control them?

After the passage of the National Recovery Act there was a move toward organization the like of which had not been seen before in this country. Believing in the good faith of the administration and Congress, wage earners eagerly applied for union membership. They honestly believed that organization in unions to cooperate in carrying out the purposes and procedures of the National Recovery Act was a duty to themselves and the country. To the amazement of many, discharges and lay-offs for union activity was the response of management. Many found they had no choice but to join the company union which employers began establishing along standard patterns. To make effective the purposes of the law enacted last year we now ask for additional legislation.

Never was there such a campaign of ruthless persecution launched against working men and women who literally interpreted section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act as according them the right to step out and organize. In their simple faith in Congress, in the Government, and in the laws of the land, these workers who had been held in a condition approximating servitude for many decades stepped out, believing they were free, and united with their fellow workers in trade unions.

What happened? Immediately a campaign of discrimination; men and women persecuted, discharged, thrown out of work. What for? Only because, inspired by the language of section 7 (a), they had dared to join a labor union.

Members of this committee, only a working man who is forced to go home from his job and sit down in the bare rooms of his home, without an income, and his family hungry, can understand what it means to lose a job. And of course out of that has grown bitterness, unrest, and industrial strife. We have enacted in the Department of Commerce building now a drama growing out of the unrest in the automobile industry, and that has grown out of the fact that this industry that had no company unions prior to the passage of the National Recovery Act organized these company unions, and called the workers in and advised them, in no uncertain language, that they wanted them to become members of the company union. Immediately the workers resented that, that attitude of paternalism. They wanted to be free men. And gradually, ever since, through the imposition of this company union, unrest has developed, feeling has been engendered, until today the automobile industry stands upon the verge of one of the greatest strikes that has ever taken place in the history of this Nation, and it is directly traceable to the determination of the automobile managers to compel their workers to belong to company unions.

Last August, when the National Labor Board, in its present form, was organized, it was upon the formal assumption and belief that the employers of the country were willing and eager to comply with the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act; that force was unnecessary in securing that compliance; that only through misunderstandings would failure to comply arise, and that these instances of failure to comply could be smoothed out and eliminated by an agency set up to bring the two parties to the misunderstanding, employer and employee, together.

But this assumption has broken down in the 7 months of the National Labor Board's existence. Perhaps it would be nearer the truth to say that the assumption has been destroyed by the stubbornness of some employers who never have wanted, do not now want, and do not intend to accept that portion of the National Industrial Recovery Act which guaranteed to labor the right to organize, to choose its own representatives, freely and unafraid, and to bargain collectively. Labor thought, last August, that section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, had done exactly what the bill under discussion today aims to do, that is, to equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees and encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees. Labor has never asked, and does not now ask, more than that the equality of bargaining power and freedom from restraint so essential if we are to carry out the recovery program, be established in fact. Only through something approaching equality of bargaining power can we hope to create and maintain mass purchasing power; only through freedom from restraint on the part of employers can labor hope to build up the necessary bargaining power.

The bill we are discussing today must be looked upon as a frank recognition of several facts: First, that collective bargaining is not wanted by all employers; second, that some employers—how many, I cannot say—have shown themselves entirely unwilling to support the recovery program; third, that if unobstructed organization of the workers is to proceed, it must do so in the face of bitter and often unscrupulous opposition from these employers; fourth, that if collective bargaining is to be carried out, it must be forced upon some employers; and fifth, that the agency set up by President Roosevelt last August has not the requisite power and authority to enforce section 7 (a).

Certainly no one can deny that the National Labor Board has done a real work. But no one can deny that it has not done what it was hoped it would do. This failure to fulfill all our hopes can in no way be considered as the fault of the Board itself. Rather, it is due entirely to the position in which the Board has been placed by the ambiguous nature of section 7 (a). The National Labor Board has been given a very heavy burden of responsibility—that of preserving industrial peace—without the accompanying authority which is essential if its responsibility is to be fulfilled. The Board has been consistently forced to straddle the real issue in many of the cases, and the real issue is that of union recognition for collective bargaining.

When the Board came up to that issue it was then face to face with an insurmountable obstacle, and of course the Board, calling upon its own resourcefulness as a mediation instrumentality, endeavored, through mediations, to prevail upon employers and employees to agree.

Unless Congress is prepared to establish the National Labor Board as an authoritative body, with power to enforce its rulings, it must be prepared to see the entire national recovery program held in increasing disrespect and disregard. There is no middle course. For 7 months we have tried the method of persuasion. It has not worked. We are now forced to recognize that a deliberate and planned campaign is underway, on the part of certain employers, not to comply with section 7 (a). We must recognize this fact and meet it. Not only is labor deprived of the rights granted it by the National Industrial Recovery Act, not only is social justice defeated, but also the fair-minded employers, who are in a majority, are prevented also from carrying out the purposes of the administration. The employers who are systematically challenging and impeding the action of the National Labor Board are, as I have just stated, in the minority. We must not, in fact we cannot, permit the lawless few deliberately to destroy an agency which the cooperative majority are willing and eager to support. There will always be some employers who yield only to coercion, to legal action. Upon these few the moral force and the appeal to public opinion upon which the Board has so far been forced to depend, are not sufficient. Industrial law, like civil or criminal law, is aimed at the few, and not at the many.

This labor disputes bill becomes necessary largely because of the failure of the employers of the country to abide by the spirit and the letter of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Congress had listened to the voice of the workers and when it gave employees the right to organize for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, it gave workers the right to self-organization and representation through representatives of their own choosing. Did the employers of the country accept this law? Many refused to listen to the voice of the workers and the voice of Congress, even the voice of the President. They made haste to say to their workers: "You must have organization. Here is a plan of representation." And pretty soon what they had was not self-organization at all.

The National Industrial Recovery Act marks a most important step in the emancipation of the workers. It abolishes the yellow-dog contract. Workers cannot as a condition of employment be required to join a company union or to refrain from joining, assisting or organizing a union of their own choosing. This clear-cut abolition of the yellow-dog contract is a great step forward. But it has done nothing to abolish the company union. In fact it has caused them to multiply. Now it must be remembered that only a small number of employers ever used a yellow-dog contract. The majority of company union shops depended on other tactics for the promotion of their home-made unions. And now company unions are spreading to many more companies. The bona fide labor movement is attacked on a much wider front.

May I make this observation upon this particular point just here. Section 7 (a) provides that no worker shall be required to join a company unions as a condition of employment. That is specific and plain.

Now may I take the liberty of stating that, in my opinion, Congress intended, when that section was adopted, that workers would not be required to join a company union. But let me ask you, what is the difference in requiring a man who seeks employment to join the company union as a condition of employment, and requiring all of the workers already employed to join the company union, in spirit at least, in order to hold their jobs? What I mean by that is this: When the company union is formulated and the law is drafted in the sacred precincts where the board of directors meet, and it is carried out and handled to the workers and they are asked to accept it and to join, the gesture itself carried with it coercion because those who know the workers understand how full of fear they are. They do not want to offend the management. The whole atmosphere is surcharged with coercion. Immediately the foremen and subforemen and bosses and managers are all enlisted as organizers, and they go from John to Jim and Bill and Jack on the bench and give them to understand that it is the desire of the company that they identify themselves with the company union.

This is coercion, this is intimidation, and in my judgment it is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law.

Someone has said that the company union movement since the National Industrial Recovery Act is an attempt to put new wine into old bottles. I disagree. I've looked into a lot of these plans and have heard a lot about their working, and I tell you it's the same old wine in the same old bottles. They haven't even changed the labels. They have merely changed the advertising.

To abandon this figure of speech, few of the company union plans in themselves pretend to be an agency for collective bargaining. Show me a company union through which a wage agreement, signed and sealed by the representatives of the union and the management, has ever been consummated. Never one.

The new constitutions carry the same old statements of purposes. These emphasize communication and cooperation, not the give and take of collective bargaining. "Business Week" was right, perhaps unintentionally so, when it stated, December 30, 1933, that General Motors set up the Chevrolet Employees Association "to cooperate with the Chevrolet management." In the scores of company union plans which have been sent in to the federation, only one mentions collective bargaining, one out of six, and that one is S. Dresner & Sons, Inc., Co., whose plan came to grief in the National Labor Board. The General Cable Corporation in its suggested plan of employees' representation mentions the National Industrial Recovery Act in these words:

> The purpose of this plan is to promote a more direct and mutual relationship between the employees of this plant and its management, in respect to conditions and terms of employment and all other matters of mutual interest or concern which may arise under the National Industrial Recovery Act, in furtherance of the declared policy thereof.

It is in the letters to the employees selling them the company union schemes that the companies depart from reality and in the new phraseology of the National Industrial Conference Board, state that a company union provides machinery for collective bargaining. As soon as the N.I.R.A. gave workers the right to collective bargaining through representatives of their own choosing, the employer's organizations began to say "there are two kinds of collective bargaining." In June the conference board published a book on collective bargaining through employee representation. In it they said:

Collective bargaining has been practiced in this country in two forms. One form recognizes the working force of each company as a compact unit, and the management deals directly and exclusively with representatives of this group. The other form seeks to organize into trade unions all those within particular trades, and dealings with employers are carried on by officers of the organized union, who in most cases are not employees of the company with which the union may be negotiating.

Tead and Metcalf wrote "Labor Relations Under the Recovery Act" about the same time. Though they urge the formation of an employee-representation plan under some circumstances, they state in unequivocal terms:

Some employers now speak of negotiations with their own employees exclusively through the medium of shop committees, factory councils, company unions, etc., as collective bargaining. * * * To apply a term which has been used for decades to connote dealings with an inclusive body of craft or industrial workers having outside affiliations to dealings which are completely confined to one plant or one company not only is confusing but readily leads to a deception of both workers and managers as to the basic difference between the two types of negotiation. To apply the phrase "collective bargaining" to both types of transactions is to confuse the issue.

Senator DAVIS. Mr. Green, I will have to leave in a few minutes, but will be back again, probably before you conclude, however I would like to ask one question before I depart.

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Senator DAVIS. Because of the many classifications in this modern industry of ours, many employers are objecting to trade unions because of the jurisdictional dispute. What assurance has an employer with many classifications, the jurisdictional dispute will not enter into his factory, and that it will be amicably adjusted without a general strike in the industry?

Mr. GREEN. My dear Senator, that objection is not well founded, because it is the policy of the American Federation of Labor, particularly in mass production industries, to set up their works council, the trade union councils in these mass-production industries, and to negotiate agreements through collective bargaining for all the workers at the same time, so that contracts will begin and end at the same time.

Now, I will admit that in the building trade organization the question of jurisdiction is still a serious one, a difficult problem, but that is a problem that has come down to us at the beginning. The employers who object to jurisdictional disputes are those who will suffer least from jurisdictional disputes, and that is the mass-production industries.

Senator DAVIS. As you went on in the earlier part of your paper, did I get a slight notion that you were more of less favoring compulsory arbitration?

Mr. GREEN. No, sir; and the bill does not provide for compulsory arbitration.

Senator DAVIS. I know the bill does not provide for it, it does not deny the right to strike; but you continued with your remarks it was creeping into my mind, at least, that you were leaning toward compulsory arbitration.

Mr. GREEN. Well, I want to relieve that impression because we do not favor, nor do we ask for compulsory arbitration as applicable to either employers or employees.

Turning specifically to the sections of the act which have to do with limitations on company unions, namely, section 5, articles 3 to 6, I cannot overemphasize how important these provisions are to safeguard the rights of workers for self-organization and representation through representatives of their own choosing. Article 3 states that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer or anyone acting in his interest directly or indirectly to—initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, bylaws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization.

We believe that that section as I have just read it or referred to it is in thorough accord with the letter and the spirit of section 7 (a) and section 7 (b) of the National Recovery Act. In other words, it is intended to give vitality and strength and reality to the provisions of section 7 (a) and the Senator has well drafted this section, and I imagine that it was drafted out of his experience as a member of the national labor board.

However, I wish to refer to a development which has taken place almost simultaneously with the preparation of this act. Company unions had been established upon the transportation lines of the Nation. These company unions had been organized by the railroad executives. They were fostered, financed, nursed, assisted, and in many instances administered by the representatives of the railroad executives. The situation was appealed to the commissioner of railroads. Commissioner Eastman, the Director of Railroads——

Senator WAGNER. The coordinator of railroads.

Mr. GREEN. The coordinator of railroads. As the result of his study of the situation he issued the following order, and I think it is quite appropriate for me to read it for the record just now:

The history of the organization of many of the company unions—

as disclosed in the carriers' answers to my questionnaire, points to the conclusion that they have not been duly designated and authorized to represent employees in accordance with the above requirements. Their organization appears to have been tainted in many instances with coercion or influence on the part of the carrier managements. They must be cleared of such taint if they are to meet the specifications of the Emergency Act.

The principle now embodied in the law, in short, is that railroad managements must keep their hands off, so far as labor organizations are concerned. That this principle is sound is not open to question, if we believe, as we must, that employees are free American citizens and not a menial class subservient to the employing class.

What a splendid argument in opposition to company unions!

Whatever may have been the attitude of employees in the past, it is plain that today they are prepared to insist upon the right to bargain and deal collectively with their employers upon equal terms. The provisions of section 7 (e) with respect to the railroads are paralleled by the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act with respect to other industries, and the latter provisions are recognized in the codes which have been and are being established. The same principles are implicit in the Railway Lab[illegible]t and in the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-injunction Act. They are principles [illegible]ch have, as aforesaid, been accepted by most railroads with respect to certain classes of employees and by some railroads with respect to all classes, and with good results.

Nothing will make for more dissatisfaction among railroad employees and affect their morale more adversely than attempts to undermine these sound principles, which are now a part of the law of the land. No practices retard the permanent improvement of labor relations and destroy the spirit of cooperation between men and managements more effectively than efforts to interfere with free choice of labor organizations and representatives. No one factor leads more certainly in the long run to strikes and threats of strikes. Nor is anything more important to railroad rehabilitation and the future good of the industry than relations between employees and managements which will promote a more constructive and a less defensive attitude on the part of the employees and their organizations. The employees form the largest part of the industry and they can only prosper as it prospers, but this basic fact is often forgotten when the sound principles which the law now recognizes are denied and can be maintained only through struggle and strife.

To the end, therefore, that railroad labor practices may be brought into entire harmony with the law and the basis be laid for peaceful and cooperative labor relations, I offer for your consideration the following suggestions for action on the part of the railroads:

(1) That all carrier officers, subordinate officials, supervisors, and agents be advised by appropriate notice that influence, or coercion by them of employees with respect to membership or nonmembership in organizations of labor or choice of labor representatives, or any interference with such organizations, is illegal and will not be tolerated; and that employees who exercise their right to join or not to join a labor organization, or who legally solicit membership in such an organization or who discontinue membership in or cease to pay dues to a labor organization must not in any way be cautioned, reprimanded, threatened, penalized or otherwise subjected to pressure or discipline because of such action or nonaction.

(2) That all employees be advised by appropriate notice posted on bulletin boards and distributed generally that, in accordance with the provisions of section 2, paragraph 3, of the Railway Labor Act and paragraphs (o), (p), and (q) of section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended March 1933, which paragraphs were by section 7 (e) of the Emergency Railroad Act, 1933, made applicable to all carriers by railroad, they are free to join or not to join any labor organization and will in no way be penalized or prejudiced by the management because of their choice.

(3) That those railroads which have at any time in the past required any employees as a condition of employment to sign a contract or agreement to join or not to join a labor organization, notify their employees by an appropriate order that such contracts or agreements have been discarded and are no longer binding in any way.

(4) That all railroads cease in any way to contribute financially to the support of any labor organizations or pay the salaries, wages, or expenses of any labor or employee representative while engaged on behalf of employers in carrying out the purposes of the railway labor act, except in the case of members of local shop committees who work regularly at their trade and who, by virtue of a written rule included in a labor contract protected by the proviso of section 10 (a) of the emergency act, are not to suffer loss of time when they meet with the local shop supervisors or officials on company time for the purpose of handling a local grievance matter.

(5) That those railroads which retain any control over the constitution and bylaws of any labor organization, or whose officers, subordinate officials, supervisors, or agents participate in the process of selecting representatives of employees in connection with labor agreements or disputes, withdraw from all such participation or control.

(6) That those railroads which now extend special privileges exclusively to the members of any labor organization, such as group insurance or contributions to relief funds, either make such privileges available to all employees concerned or cease extending them only to the member of such labor organization.

(7) That those railroads which now audit the accounts and books of labor organizations or act as agents for labor organizations for the purpose of collecting or assisting in the collection of their dues and fees, discontinue providing these services to such labor organizations.

In submitting this matter for your consideration, I do so in the hope and belief that compliance with the law can be assured by voluntary action of the railroads, and I am confident that only good results will flow from such voluntary action.

There is a splendid argument in support of the Wagner bill. That prohibits the representatives of the railroads from doing the very things that you say the management of private industries shall not do, and if this ruling made by Coordinator Eastman, which I understand is in accordance with the law, is good for the railroads of the Nation, for the transportation industry, then I say to you that the Wagner bill is good for private industry. It will abolish abuses. It will make men free. It will prevent them from being subjected to the membership in a union, a company union, against their will. It will eliminate this contantly rising feeling of discontent in the minds of the workers which ultimately must develop into an industrial conflagration. And I say to you, my friends, and I say it in all seriousness and with a full sense of my personal responsibility, that industry in America is, as it were, undermined by a volcano of industrial discontent, and the responsibility is directly traceable to the employers of the Nation, who have in a short-sighted way imposed, if you please, company unions upon the workers of the Nation. They resent it. They hate it. They are against it, and not only will there be strikes in the automobile industry, not so much against wages as against the company unions, but it will spread to steel and other industries of the country, unless the greedy hands of these employers are restrained.

Now may I refer just briefly to the growth of company unions. The growth of company unions in the past few months is ample proof of employers' activities in initiating and supervising these pseudo-labor organizations. First, let us examine the numerical growth of the company union. There is just one bit of statistical information on this subject, the report of the National Industrial Conference Board on Individual and Collective Bargaining Under the N.I.R.A., published in November 1933. This report is obviously a study of a sample of the larger companies in manufacturing and mining in this country. It is a sample large enough to be representative, however, including reports from over 3,300 companies, among the companies with a capitalization of $500,000 or more, representing an aggregate employment of 2½ million wage earners, or approximately 27 percent of the estimated total number of workers now employed in manufacturing and mining. Although the sample is large enough to be representative, no one would suppose that it is an unbiased sample. The interest of the National Industrial Conference Board all these years in company unions would indoubtedly lead its member companies to respond to its questionnaire, while the same reputation would undoubtedly cause some more broad-minded companies to throw the questionnaire into the waste basket promptly. That the conference board assumes that 1,164,000 represents all the workers covered by employee representation in the country and not 27 percent of them is illustrated in its method of computing increase. Its June study, which purported to be a survey and not a sample, found 433,000 members of company unions in manufacturing and mining. This figure is compared with the 1,164,000 to show an increase of 169 percent between June and November in the wage earners in manufacturing and mining industries covered by employee representation plans.

That is significant. Between June and November, immediately following the application of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the development of company unions in industry began, and between June and November the corporations of the country, the organizers of the corporations brought all these millions of workers into company unions, I charge, for no other purpose than to thwart and make invalid the collective bargaining sections of section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act.

The CHAIRMAN. How many company unions, if you know, were organized after the passage of the N.R.A.?

Mr. GREEN. I think I have that here. As I go along with my figures, Senator, I will give you that.

Out of the 3,300 companies reporting, 556 reported that they dealt with their employees only through employee representation. Another 97 companies reported employee representation plans covering some fraction of their workers. Interestingly enough, 400 of these companies had started their employee-representation plan since the enactment of the Industrial Recovery Act.

It will be observed that the conference board asked whether companies dealt with employees individually or through a plan of employee representation or through an organized labor union. Its report makes it perfectly clear that the figures do not show how many members company unions now have, and especially how many members outside unions have among their employees. In fact, the report states:

* * * the small proportion of wage earners indicated in this study as dealing with the employer through organized labor unions does not conflict in any way with the claims of greatly increased labor-union membership. It should be borne in mind that this is a study of the relative popularity of methods of dealing with the employer and not in any way a census of membership or nonmembership in organized labor unions.

This has been frequently lost sight of when the conference board figures are quoted—and misquoted—as, for instance, by David Lawrence in a signed article in the Washington Star last week, when he said that 45 percent of the employees—what employees?—are members of unions of their own choosing which are not affiliated with national unions. Taking the figures at their face value, they show that of these 2½ million workers covered, 45.7 percent worked in companies which deal with their employees through company unions, and 9.3 percent through companies which have contracts with bona-fide labor unions.

Senator BORAH. Mr. Green.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Borah.

Mr. GREEN. Yes?

Senator BORAH. Did you say that the 45 and some percent——

Mr. GREEN. 45.7 percent.

Senator BORAH. Of the labor employees deal with company unions?

Mr. GREEN. This is what David Lawrence said.

The CHAIRMAN. This is what David Lawrence said. It is a signed article by David Lawrence. You did not yourself assert that information.

Mr. GREEN. No. I do not agree to that. The conference board report quotes statements of some reporting companies that "50 percent of our employees have joined a union." The attitude seems to be: Some of our employees have joined a union; however, we elect to deal with our employees through our works council, which we control; therefore we report that our employees have elected to deal with us through the works council. Such reasoning is on its face disingenuous to the point of cynicism.

Concerning the growth of company unions since November, no one has accurate information. The files of the National Labor Board indicate that these organizations are still being formed. True, other files—in some cases of the National Labor Board—show that some firms have signed agreements with the chosen representatives of the employees and the company unions are falling into disuse. One instance of this is the Link Belt Co. of Indianapolis.

To summarize what we know about the numbers of workers covered by employees representation plans: The National Industrial Conference Board found a million and a quarter workers covered by such plans in 1932 in all industry. In November 1933 they found almost as many workers so covered in manufacturing and mining industries. An informed estimate of the present membership of company unions throughout the country is between two and three million, not alone in manufacturing and mining but in public utilities and on the railways, and also in trade.

These company unions, I repeat, were formed by the corporations. The laws were drafted by the board of directors, they were taken to the workers ready-made, handed to them, and the workers were told, "The corporation asks you to belong to this company union and be governed by these ready-made laws."

The CHAIRMAN. You mean by-laws?

Mr. GREEN. I mean by-laws. I beg your pardon.

Senator WAGNER. And constitution, too.

Mr. GREEN. And constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. They spent the money earned by the corporation in paying highly priced men to draft these laws. They spent the money earned by the company to pay the expenses of the company union. They are using funds out of their earnings for illigitimate purposes, and in my judgment it is illegal and unlawful, because that is a method used by powerful corporations to defeat the purposes of section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act.

I ask, is it not enough for corporations to exercise all their rights under a corporate charter? Is it not enough to collect from the market in the United States the money which pays the dividends and earnings of the corporation? Is it not enough for employers to organize in the manufacturers' associations and automobile chambers of commerce, and into chambers of commerce free without interference? Is that not enough? What right have they to threaten, coerce, and intimidate the workers and compel them by indirect methods and coercion to belong to their company unions? They are not only exercising their corporate strength over the earnings of the company and in its manufacturing, but they are exercising their corporate strength over the economic power, the social welfare of these millions of employees.

Senator BORAH. And prices.

Mr. GREEN. And prices. I say to you—I feel strongly about it, because I see the development of a most menacing situation here, one that is filled with serious potentialities.

The Manufacturers' Association charged some time ago that the strikes of this country were due to labor union activities. I have hurled the charge back in their face, that these strikes are due, directly due to the illegal acts of these corporations in establishing company unions and in imposing these company unions against their will.

The CHAIRMAN. Were most of these strikes in industries where company unions prevailed?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir. The Budd Strike. I think I shall enumerate a large number of them as I go along.

The CHAIRMAN. The record shows that since the adoption of the N. R. A., whatever strikes have occurred have been more frequent in the establishments and industries where company unions exist rather than in the industries where organization labor unions, so-called exist?

Mr. GREEN. Where heretofore no contract existed between employer and employee.

Senator WALCOTT. Can we have a list of those companies where the strikes occurred?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, I have them here.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Walcott.

Mr. GREEN. Pardon me. If you were at the hearing yesterday conducted by the National Labor Board upon the complaint of those employed in the automobile industry, representing thousands, you would have soon discovered that the threatened strike, with all its serious potentialities and consequences, in the automobile industry is directly traceable not only to the determination but the actual imposition of company unions by automobile manufacturers upon their employees. They prepared them; they presented them. I say truthfully they forced them to accept them, during the period between last June and the first of December.

Senator BORAH. Are there any company unions which you concede to be voluntary unions upon the part of the employees?

Mr. GREEN. Well, Senator, I know of none. There may be some independent unions that have been formed outside of the American Federation of Labor; the Railroad Brotherhoods are bona fide unions, and there are others. We do not classify them as company unions; we classify the company unions as a union fostered by the company, organized by the company, promoted by the company, and imposed upon the workers by the company.

Senator BORAH. You would not deny to the employees of the company, should they desire to do so, the right to voluntarily organize in that company?

Mr. GREEN. Positively not. And we would not deny to a worker the right to say whether he wanted to belong to a union or stay out. We want him to have his free choice.

SENATOR BORAH. I understand that. But the idea has gotten abroad that you desire to deny the right to the employees to organize if they wish to organize.

Mr. GREEN. I want to issue my denial of that in the record. We want them to be free to say whether they want to be with us, or whether they want to be with another bona fide union, but let it be a union that is not supported and fostered and financed by a corporation.

Senator BORAH. You want to take away the domination of the employers.

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir; we want to take away the domination of the employer.

Senator BORAH. That is the limit of your desire in this matter?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Senator WALCOTT. And you want to also, do you, leave him entirely free to his individual choice, whether he should belong to any union or not?

Mr. GREEN. Absolutely.

Senator WALCOTT. With no pressure whatsoever from the employer?

Mr. GREEN. Let him decide it for himself.

Senator WAGNER. That is all this legislation is intended to do.

Mr. GREEN. That is what this legislation is intended to do.

Senator BORAH. Are we narrowing it down to the propostion of whether a man shall have the right to be free from the domination of his employer? Is that all there is to it?

Mr. GREEN. Well, Senator, we found that section 7 (a) did not work.

Senator BORAH. I know you did.

Mr. GREEN. Now we want to make it workable and vital and that is the purpose of this legislation.

Senator BORAH. Well, the purpose of it is to remove the controlling, the dominating power of the employer of forcing these employees into a company union.

Mr. GREEN. Absolutely.

Senator WAGNER. That is all it is.

The CHAIRMAN. When it comes to collective bargaining while nominally they are representatives of the employees of the railroad, they are, in fact, representatives of the employers?

Mr. GREEN. Really they are representatives of the company. I will repeat again, Senator, what I stated before you came in, that there isn't a single agreement providing for wages, hours, and conditions of employment that has been negotiated and signed by the representatives of corporations and company unions.

Senator WAGNER. That came out in the case we had yesterday.

Mr. GREEN. It came out very clearly yesterday.

Senator WAGNER. No effort ever has been made?

Mr. GREEN. No effort has ever been made at all.

Senator BORAH. Let me understand that again. What was your statement?

Senator WAGNER. Yesterday we had a hearing in the automobile industry and it came out very clearly that the company union was formed by sending to each worker a constitution and bylaws and telling him, "This is now your organization." As the result of that an election was held, and the workers testified that they voted because they knew very well if they did not vote their jobs were gone. Then they elected these representatives. We asked the representatives whether they had ever negotiated or attempted to negotiate a collective bargaining agreement as to wages and hours on behalf of the workers with the company, and they said, no; they never did, never made any such effort. The sole purpose seems to be to listen to the complaints of the workers as to some complaint around the shop, something of that kind. We tried our best to find out what else was done.

Senator BORAH. Do you think that is characteristic of company unions generally, that there is no agreement made?

Senator WAGNER. I can only speak for those that actually came before us, and it was characteristic of every case of a company-dominated union. I think there are company unions that are not dominated by the employers, independent unions that may not be affiliated at all with the national organization here.

Senator WALCOTT. While we are on that subject, why cannot we get a list here, either as part of the record, or if it is too confidential, Mr. Green, submit it to this committee for executive session. That will show all those companies that have, by force or intimidation, as you charge, compelled a company union to be organized within its own branch, and those that have unions that are independent from employer control. Why can't we get such a list as that?

Mr. GREEN. I have a list.

Senator WALCOTT. You make a very serious charge here. Now it seems to me we ought to know the exact facts about that, and the names of the people that are guilty of intimidation.

Mr. GREEN. It will be very difficult, I presume, to assemble that data, but I will endeavor to do it, Senator, and submit it to you.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Green, may I just emphasize this point, that if a union is not dominated by the employer this legislation cannot affect it.

Mr. GREEN. Then this law does not affect it.

Mr. WALCOTT. I understand.

Senator WAGNER. This legislation only affects the cases and all we do is to restrain some practices through which an employer's dominated union operates, this affects cases where the employers dominate the unions. That is all this legislation does.

Senator WALCOTT. I understand.

Senator WAGNER. If they do not dominate the union there is no interverence of any kind or character.

Senator WALCOTT. I understand.

Senator BORAH. What is your test of domination?

Senator WAGNER. For instance, financing the union, completely dominating the union through financing it, initiating the union.

The CHAIRMAN. Yesterday, Senator, in your temporary absence, Dr. S. H. Slichter, a professor from Harvard, made an able presentation injecting that thought into this bill. He thought it was conceivable that a right-minded employer could initiate a company union and not dominate it, and he rather objected to the word "initiate."

Senator WAGNER. He objected to the word "initiate."

The CHAIRMAN. He agreed with you and Mr. Green in the necessity of preventing coercion or domination by employers, but he thought an employer ought to have the right to say to his men, "you are not organized. I think you ought to get together and from an employees organization", and then leave them free to do so.

Senator WAGNER. I have no pride of words at all. It is the substance I am after.

The CHAIRMAN. It is along the line of the question of Senator Borah as to the test of domination, as to what the definition of "dominating a union" is.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. I think Senator Borah put it all in one sentence when he said the only effort here is to make free men out of workmen.

Mr. GREEN. That is all there is to it.

Senator WAGNER. That is all there is to it.

Mr. GREEN. Let the workers decide for themselves if they want to belong to a union, or if they do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it difficult for anyone to get direct evidence of domination by employers of a company union?

Mr. GREEN. It isn't difficult to secure evidence that would convince the ordinary person, Senator, because it goes back to this, that if there is no union in the plant, the corporation sets up a union for them, it drafts the bylaws of the union, and says, "Here us your union, here are your bylaws." That is what happens. The employer goes on, then, and says, "Now we want you to call an election and select your representatives." They usually participate in the selection of the representatives. The balloting is held in the factory in an atmosphere of coercion, where the subbosses and the foremen and superintendents are watching and observing and directing the whole election machinery. There is not a fair-minded man that would not say that that is a company-dominated union.

Senator WAGNER. And the workers are directed to go up and vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Walcott, you could ask the Department of Labor to procure the statistics.

Senator WALCOTT. I think it is very important, if that is an extensive thing, that we know it, because it has a distinct bearing on this bill. That is the purpose of this bill.

Senator WAGNER. I do not think it has the slightest bearing on this bill, because if the company is not dominating the union, the bill will not affect it.

Senator WALCOTT. We do not need the bill if that is the case.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly. It is only a certain type of companies that we are after.

Senator WALCOTT. Let us find out how extensive this practice is, because we don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner yesterday in his testimony, in your absence, Senator Walcott, stated that 75 percent of the strikes since the inauguration of the N. R. A. came out of or related to the creation of company unions in industries.

Senator WAGNER. It came our of the refusal of employers to recognize those who had been selected by the workers to represent them.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. The dispute was on the question of recognition, recognizing the employees' representatives.

Senator WALCOTT. And in most cases the representatives were chosen out of the union?

Senator WAGNER. No; as the result of an election by the workers, but the employees in those cases felt that they had a right to decide with whom they should deal on behalf of the workers.

Mr. GREEN. I think I can bring some of these facts out and some of the information you are referring to, in the statement I have.

The CHAIRMAN. With the permission of the committee, we will proceed, Mr. Green.

Mr. GREEN. All right. Now, how company unions are formed.

No one needs to stand here and cite evidence that company unions have been formed by companies and not by employees. That is an open secret. As General Johnson told the code authorities last week:

There is no law prohibiting a company union as such if there is no interposition whatever by employers, and if the men freely choose it.

But 99 times out of 100, you and I know that this is not the case. Let's not kid ourselves.

The printed constitutions which have been sent us by union members all over the country—some of them identical even in format, others identical only in wording—would dispel any doubt concerning the spontaneous nature of these organizations. It is interesting, however, to see how these plans have been publicized. For years, the publications of the National Industrial Conference Board and of the American Management Association have been telling employers how to start company unions.

In 1932, the Policy Holders' Bureau of the Metropolitan Life entered the field with a pamphlet called "Employee Representation", in the foreword of which was the statement, "The bureau expresses no opinion either pro or con on the subject of the report. The aim has been to present a picture of actual practices in the organization and operation of employee representation plans from a purely fact-finding point of view." In 1933, the Policy Holders' Service Bureau issued a pamphlet with the new style terminology, "Collective Bargaining Through Employee Representation." This contained no such foreword and presented two plans for employee representation: (1) for a company having widely separated units, or employees at different working locations. These plans are complete, with a suggested letter to be signed by the president of the company or the joint committee "drafting the plan" as a means of introducing the employee representation plan to those affected.

Even official governmental sanction has been given in a report by Walter C. Teagle, chairman of the industrial relations committee of the business advisory and planning council for the Department of Commerce. In his introduction, Mr. Teagle states that his report "champions the advantages of employee representation for the purposes of collective bargaining."

Since the National Industrial Recovery Administration trade papers have told their readers how, either by printing the constitution of the Carnegie Steel plan or the Chrysler Motor Co. plan, or by news notes that the Republic Steel & Iron Co., which had operated a successful plan for 15 years, would send a copy of its constitution on request, or that the industrial relations section of Princeton University would send a bibliography of reference.

Mr. T. H. A. Tiedeman, of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, is quoted in Personnel, the magazine of the American Management Association, for November 1933, as saying that one company, presumably his own company, had sent out almost 2,000 copies of an outline of preparation and installation of an employee representation plan—

For the confidential use of many executives, who because of the Industrial Recovery Act, are making inquiry as to the best method of inaugurating a plan of collective bargaining between elected representatives of employees and management.

Mr. Tiedeman states that inquiries were carefully scrutinized so that answers were sent only to the 2,000 worthwhile inquiries.

Mr. GREEN. Here I have a number of plans prepared by these service organizations, as I am informed, and everyone of them are similar.

The CHAIRMAN. Just what are they?

Mr. GREEN. Here is the plan of employee representation of the Allenwood Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

Mr. GREEN. It is a constitution and bylaws draft.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a booklet of constitution and bylaws for the use of employees in some particular industry? What are the names of the industries, please?

Mr. GREEN. I will give them to you. The Allenwood Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Located where, do you know?

Mr. GREEN. Conshohocken, Pa. Here is the representation plan of the Carnegie Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they all alike?

Mr. GREEN. Here is the representation plan of the Continental Can.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they all similar?

Mr. GREEN. All similar. The Weirton Steel Co., that is at Weirton, W. Va.

The employee representation plan of the Illinois Steel.

You notice they claim to be the bylaws of the companies, the steel companies.

The CHAIRMAN. They all seem to have the same colored cover.

Mr. GREEN. The Trenton works of the American Steel & Wire Co.; consolidated works of the American Steel & Wire Co.; Michigan Limestone & Chemical Co.; Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.

Then here are some others that I will refer to later. These plans are all drafted by experts and you may look at them if you wish [handing papers].

Senator WAGNER. I think you will find that all of them prevent their choosing anybody as a representative except somebody in the plant.

Senator BORAH. This booklet here says:

> This plan shall in no way discriminate against any employee because of race, sex or creed, or abridge or conflict with his rights to belong or not to belong to any lawful society, fraternity, union or other organization.

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Senator BORAH. Is that carried out?

Mr. GREEN. Which?

The CHAIRMAN. That bylaw.

Senator BORAH. That bylaw which says it does not interfere with anyone joining another union? I do not see how that would work.

Mr. GREEN. Yes, it says that, Senator, but when they join another union they are immediately told that they are discharged.

Senator WALCOTT. Mr. Green, you know that we want facts in this thing and that is a wholesale, sweeping statement, that an employer will discharge anybody who does not agree to belong to this particular union. Can you bring that as a wholesale charge?

Mr. GREEN. My dear Senator, I have been sitting on the National Labor Board as a member of that board for months and I have heard the cases of these workers who came in with their grievances, members who dared to join labor unions and who were discharged because they joined labor unions, ruthless persecution.

Senator WALCOTT. Although they belonged to the company union perhaps?

Mr. GREEN. Many of them refused to join, formed their own union and wanted to deal with the companies through their own chosen representatives but they were deprived from doing so because the company simply refused to deal with them.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Green, have we not had cases too where the only request the workers asked was an opportunity to have an election in which they could freely express their thoughts as to whether they wanted one representative or another representative, whether they wanted a union representative or a non-union representative?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. And that the companies have resisted any requests on the part of the employees simply to have an election to determine it as free men?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Senator BORAH. This is another bylaw which should perhaps be read in connection with the bylaw which I read previously:

> The management of the works and the direction of the working forces, including the right to hire, suspend, or discharge for proper cause, or transfer, and the right to relieve employees from duty because of lack of work or for other legitimate reasons, is vested exclusively in the management; and, except as expressly provided herein, these rights shall not be abridged by anything contained herein.

The management has the exclusive right to determine when they have abided by the laws?

Mr. GREEN. Yes; and most of them provide, Senator, that these bylaws can only be amended by a unanimous vote of the members of the works council and the plant management.

Senator WAGNER. I think maybe we ought to read the proposed amendments in it. It is a little different, but here is the way you may amend this union of workers.

The CHAIRMAN. You are reading now one of the bylaws that provides the means for amending the bylaws?

Senator WAGNER. This is the employee representation plan of the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.:

> Any method of procedure hereunder may be amended at any time by two-thirds vote of the entire membership of the joint committee on rules, or by concurrent majority vote of the employees' representatives and of the representatives of the management at an annual conference.

In other words, without the consent of the management these employees' unions cannot amend their bylaws.

Senator WALCOTT. Is that number XI?

Senator WAGNER. That is number XI.

Senator WALCOTT. It is exactly word for word with this one. They are all similar.

Senator THOMAS. I have looked over all of these and they are practically the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Green, you may proceed.

I want to say, Senator Walcott, that he is supporting this bill, not only as the representative of organized labor, but as a result of his experience on the Labor Board, of which Senator Wagner is chairman, so that some of the facts that he has given are the result of observation there.

Will you proceed, Mr. Green?

Mr. GREEN. The plan which "this company" sent out is complete even to instructions for a trip around the city and taking a picture at the first district meeting and the menu for the dinner. Let us not be distracted, however, by the amusing features of this plan. More interesting, as revealing the unfortunate, insincere attitude of business men in this crisis, is the instruction as to how to start the plan so that it seems to come from the employees. It is interesting that these instructions are on a typewritten sheet pasted to the mimeographed outline of "Steps necessary to prepare and conduct elections." I quote in full:

In order to have an employee representation plan, somebody has to start it. Since it cannot function at all unless the employees choose it as their medium, it is highly beneficial to have the first suggestion come from them, and to have their recommendation and approval for each step and for the whole procedure.

Therefore, for the items covered herein, it is desirable to have the advice and approval of a committee of employees before the presentation of a plan for the consideration of the employees as a whole.

To do this, an employee is usually selected who is unquestionably representative of the group as a whole. He is asked to name another employee, with the idea that the two of them will name one more, or such other number as in their opinion would be equitable to draw up the fundamentals of a plan.

The various items which are covered in this booklet are then turned over to them for their consideration, in order that there may be discussion so as to develop any changes and amendments which, in their opinion, would be beneficial. This committee of employees would then sign the election notice together with the President (and probably other members of the management).

When the first meeting is held, this employee committee would act with the chairman in presenting to the meeting for its adoption the joint agreement, which would represent the mutual recommendation of the management and the employee committee.

The outline of preparation and installation includes a suggested letter from the President to department and field managers. The items in parentheses and italic within the letter were added in longhand, apparently an afterthought—after the N.I.R.A.

(Date.)

Suggested letter from the President to department and field managers.

The board of directors has authorized the installation of a representation plan in this company. The plan (which has been approved by a committee of the employees), is practically identical with those which have been in successful operation for some years in many other companies. As you know, we have contemplated the adoption of such a method for some time and we have now made the decision in order to be in harmony with the provisions of the Industrial Recovery Act.

You will undoubtedly share my satisfaction at this announcement which offers to the employees and the management further and better opportunity for the discussion of their mutual problems and the furtherance of their common interests.

There is attached a set of instructions together with the other papers necessary for conducting the election. Please read these carefully so as to become thoroughly familiar with the details.

Please feel free to call on us for any further information or advice as we wish to aid you (and the employees) in every way in assuring an election in your territory or plant which will be fully participated in by all employees.

Yours very truly,

PRESIDENT.

This particular outline of installation includes no letter to employees. Our mail included three identical letters to employees announcing that the ------ ------ company, adhering to the principles set forth in the National Industrial Recovery Act, had inaugurated a plan of employee representation. There is nothing different in these three excepting the date and the letterhead.

CONTINENTAL CAN CO., INC.,
Harvey, La., August 7, 1933.

To our employees:

It gives us pleasure to announce that the Continental Can Co., Inc., adhering to the principles set forth in the National Industrial Recovery Act, sponsored by the President of the United States, and passed by the Congress, has inaugurated a plan of employees representation under the provisions of which the employees of our various departments and operations will have a voice in all matters pertaining to industrial relations.

A copy of plan is enclosed herewith, which we hope you will read carefully, and give it your hearty support.

We would suggest that arrangements be made promptly to have this plan become effective by nomination and election of representatives, as provided under the law.

The whole-hearted support of the plan by you and your fellow employees will be appreciated.

Very truly yours,

Here is another from the Sun Oil Co. at Marcus Hook, Pa., dated July 17, referring to a number of petitions signed by a large group of our employees requesting the company to approve the adoption of an employee representation plan, and suggesting that employees select "from among your own groups representatives to work out the details of an employee representation plan" in an election to be held on July 20 and 21. The letter makes it clear that many details of the plan have already been worked out:

* * * The refinery has been divided into seven election divisions. One representative shall be elected from each election division by a secret vote. A ballot containing full information concerning the election is enclosed herewith for your use * * *. Three employees shall act as tellers who will count all the ballots and announce the results of the election.

The construction department of the refinery has been invited to select representatives and will be asked to join your selected representatives in developing a representation plan.

You are urged to vote in this election in order that the representatives may be selected as a result of a full and free choice on the part of the employees.

Another bit of very persuasive writing appears in a letter sent employees of the Fisher Body Corporation of Detroit on August 17, in which they say: "We have made this plan your plan." I quote the letter in full:

We are presenting in detail in the attached booklet—

All set up, all drafted—

a plan to provide all employees under our jurisdiction with direct personal representation with management through men of your own selection.

It has been our purpose in preparing this plan to provide in the fairest possible manner every possible agency for thorough and sincere cooperation between employees and management in all matters pertaining to the operation of our plants which affect our employees or our relations with our employees.

It has always been our sincere purpose to manage this business with the greatest possible benefit to our employees, commensurate with general business conditions.

Consequently we have made this plan your plan.

It has no strings tied to it in any way; requires no payment of dues and we expect to gain from this closer relationship a more sympathetic, mutual understanding of the problems common to employees and management.

Your cooperation will guarantee the success of the plan and its success will assure the continued satisfactory operation of this plant.

They are in here now threatened with a strike and the strike would have taken place four days ago if the National Labor Board had not intervened, offered its good offices, and brought them in and delayed the strike.

Senator WAGNER. And it involves approximately how many men, Mr. Green?

Mr. GREEN. The Fisher Body involves——

Senator WAGNER. I mean the whole situation there.

Mr. GREEN. One hundred and fifty thousand.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the exact issue in that case?

Mr. GREEN. The company union.

The CHAIRMAN. They are resenting the——

Mr. GREEN (interposing). They are resenting the imposition of company unions and they ask that they be permitted to form their own union free from the domination of the company, to elect their own representatives at an election so that these representatives may meet with the management for the purpose of dealing with them. That is what they asked, and the strike is threatened because the companies say, "No, you cannot do that."

Senator WAGNER. They cannot have an election?

Mr. GREEN. We have another one here to the employees in the Kimberly-Clark Corporation Mills in Neenah, Wis., dated June 14, 1933:

On June 12 and 13 nineteen men and women, elected by their fellow employees in mills of this corporation, met in Neenah, at my invitation, with an equal number of management representatives, to discuss a plan under which we may work in harmony with the letter and spirit of the National Industrial Recovery bill. This bill will probably have become law before this reaches you. Among its purposes are two which are of great mutual interest, as stated in my letter of June 5, viz, the spread of employment and the increase in income of employees.

In our discussions of the 12th and 13th we thrashed out a revision of our council plan which completely satisfies the requirements of the law and under which satisfactory relations between management and employees of this corporation will not only be safeguarded but advanced.

A copy of the proposed new council plan, as amended and approved by your representatives and by the representatives of the management is attached for your critical study. Under it, genuine legislative responsibilities will be placed upon the representatives whom you elect to serve you. Employees of this corporation and their representatives will, under the plan as now revised, assume joint responsibility for major decisions which affect the welfare of employees, of stockholders, and the future of the corporation itself.

It is my firm belief that Kimberly-Clark employees are ready for and competent to assume these greater responsibilities. We look forward with confidence to your acceptance of this plan upon the date set for the "yes" or "no" vote. We also look forward with pleasure to our closer cooperation together under the plan.

I hope you will be patient with me because I am trying to make the case of the American Federation of Labor here for your information, and I know that the manufacturers are coming in to state their opposition later.

COMPANY UNIONS IN THE STEEL COMPANIES

I have indicated above that many of the company union plans are identical. That is more than a coincidence. It is interesting to see how there are certain large families of plans. Take the steel family, for instance. The Bethlehem Steel Co. has had an employee representation plan for 15 years. This is the granddaddy of many later plans. It was taken as a pattern by the steel companies in setting up employee representation plans in June 1933. The plan of the Carnegie Steel Co., widely publicized—the entire constitution printed in the magazine Steel for June 19, 1933—was the Bethlehem plan with the addition of the following paragraphs:

The management of the works and the direction of the working forces, including the right to hire, suspend or discharge for proper cause, or transfer, and the right to relieve employees from duty because of lack of work, or for other legitimate reasons, is vested exclusively in the management; and, except as expressly provided herein, these rights shall not be abridged by anything contained herein.

Where does a discharged employee get a chance under that?

This plan shall be and remain in full force and effect during the term of the National Industrial Recovery Act and thereafter may be terminated by the management or by a majority of the duly elected employees' representatives upon three months' notice.

Hastily set up, conceived in the minds of shrewd business executives to serve as a shadow without substance during the operation of the emergency National Recovery Act, and then to be terminated if they so desire.

During the fall, when the Bethlehem plan celebrated its fifteenth birthday, there was great jubilation that now the N.I.R.A. recognizes the value of such a plan under its provisions for collective bargaining. In Steel for October 2, E. G. Grace, president of Bethlehem Steel, reports:

The principles of our plan have been adopted by all other important steel companies, and by many large organizations in other industries. Meeting the requirements of the N.I.R.A. our employees' representation plan continues to serve as the medium of representation just as it has in the past.

Apparently that was a premature boast, for during the last 2 months the steel companies have found it necessary to change this time-honored plan. Steel for February 26 recorded that employees of the Carnegie Steel Co., the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation and other large producers in the Pittsburgh district voted favorably on February 22 and 23 on proposed changes liberalizing their employee representation plan adopted in June. Steel for March 5 stated: "The pressure for outlawing company unions is being counteracted by a liberalization of the plans already in effect at many steel works." A concession.

A union member out in Ohio sent me a copy of a letter revealing how this change was being made. You will see that according to the interpretations of the N.I.R.A.:

Our present plan has some clauses that make it illegal. The proposed amendment to our plan will meet the requirements of the law and make it acceptable to the Labor Board. The plan as amended has the approval of our company officers and the local management. It also requires the approval of the employees to make it legal. The failure of the employees of Guernsey Works to give this approval would mean that our plant could not be legally operated unless some other plan was found. At present there doesn't seem to be any other plan that would meet the requirements of the law and be acceptable to both the employees and the management.

Let us stop a minute and see what the steel companies have done. Obviously, they have had no change of heart; only a change of tactics. When they found that features of their plans are being interpreted as illegal, did they say to their employees:

Apparently the employees relations plan which we adopted last summer is not legal; we can tell from the decisions in Labor Board cases that certain features of these are contrary to the spirit of the N.I.R.A. It will undoubtedly make trouble to continue these plans. Let us have free discussion as to what kind of plan you want. Let us have an election to vote as you want.

They had this opportunity, but alas, they did not take it. They posted notices or wrote form letters saying: Our plan is illegal, but if we change it thus and so it will meet the letter of the law. Of course you will have to approve it first, but that is a mere matter of form. Vote on the dotted line. As Steel for March 5 makes clear, employees voted on the dotted line. Why not? The new plan was better than the old one, anyhow.

Since the Carnegie Steel plan has served as a model for so many other plans, let us see what sort of plan it is, both before and after these changes. The purpose of the plan is stated as follows:

In order to give the employees of the Carnegie Steel Co. a voice in regard to the conditions under which they labor, and to provide for effective communication and means of contact between the management and employees on matters pertaining to industrial relations, the following plan of employee representation has been adopted.

At least they have not pretended that it gives the employees an equal voice. In fact, they have specifically reserved to the management the last word and the loudest voice, as we have already seen. It is significant that the paragraph that management is vested exclusively in the management in not touched in the amendments.

The original plan provides:

1. Employees of 60 days' service vote for representatives.

2. Only employees with a year's service, 21 years of age, and United States citizens can be elected as representatives.

3. These employee representatives meet annually with the representatives appointed by the management, who may equal but not exceed the employee representatives in number. The plan functions currently through a series of committees meeting monthly; every other month the employees' committees are to meet with an equal number of the management representatives. Meanwhile, the management appoints a "management's representative" to "keep the management in touch with the representatives, and represent the management in negotiations with the representatives, their officers, and committees."

4. The company pays for time necessarily lost at actual attendance at regular meetings or at special meetings of conferences jointly approved.

5. A representative shall be deemed to have vacated his office upon termination of employment, transfer from one voting unit to another, or promotion to a position having a right to hire or discharge employees, as well as by recall from his constitutents.

6. The management which started the plan reserves the right to end the plan. The workers have no choice. It does not expect to do so so long as the National Industrial Recovery Act makes machinery for collective bargaining necessary, but after that the plan may be terminated by the management or a majority of the company's representatives on 3 months' notice.

After all the fuss and feathers, the following changes have been made.

1. The age, service, citizenship qualifications for voters and representatives are removed. All employees on the company pay rolls may vote excepting company officials and persons having the right to hire or discharge. And "there shall be no restriction or limitation in the choice of representatives."

2. With the qualifications for election changed, the situations in which a representative shall be deemed to have vacated his office are reduced to "appointment to such a position as would bring him within the meaning of company officials and persons having the right to hire or discharge."

3. The provision for recall of a representative is changed from "approval by the committee on rules of a petition signed by two thirds of the voters in his department" to "a two-thirds majority vote by secret ballot of the voters in his department or unit, following approval by the committee on rules of a petition signed by two thirds of the voters in the unit."

4. Conference of all the employees' representatives of the plant or of these employees' representatives and the representatives of management may be held from time to time as determined by the employees' committee on rules or the joint committee on rules as the case may be. At such conferences negotiations may be carried on between the representatives of the employees and the representatives of management on: Rules, ways and means, safety and prevention of accidents, economy and waste prevention, wages, piecework, and tonnage rates, hours of employment and working conditions, housing and living conditions, health and works sanitation, education and publications, athletics and recreation, continuity of employment and conditions of industry.

This may mean a change in frequency of meetings, since originally only an annual meeting was scheduled and nothing was indicated concerning the meeting excepting that the joint committee on rules would be in charge of the procedure of the conference.

5. The right of termination of the plan is taken from the management. The announcement in one mill explained, "The plan is now binding on the company unless and until a majority of employees voting at a regular annual election vote to terminate it."

Thus the steel companies' plan, 1934 model, is "liberalized" over the 1933 model, but it is still the steel companies' plan. After the publicity of these changes, we have here an employer-dominated plan.

Now look for a moment at the way this plan has spread. I do not confess to have a complete file of company-union plans. Among those which members of our affiliated unions have sent in are the following like the Bethlehem Steel plan:

Green Bay Drop Forge Co., Pittsburgh Steel Co.

Other older company plans which are similar in many respects are:

Swift & Co., Standard Oil of Indiana, Cheney Bros., Goodyear Tire, Youngstown Sheet & Tube, Armour & Co.

A much larger number are like the Carnegie Steel plan, a 1933 version of the older Bethlehem plan:

Alan Wood Steel Co., American Rolling Mills Co. (slightly more liberal in details), American Steel & Wire Co., Illinois Steel Co., Inland Steel Co. (this plan provides specifically that officials of labor organizations are not eligible as representatives).

United States Pipe & Foundry Co. (this plan has its own merit clause, as follows:

> It is clearly understood and agreed that nothing contained herein shall impair * * * constitutional rights of employee * * * to bargain collectively * * * nor to operate an open shop * * *. Nothing contained herein is intended to prevent the selection, retention, and advance of employees on their individual merit without regard to their affiliation or nonaffiliation with any labor organization.

Weirton Steel, other industries following the same plan are: Lyon Metal Products Co., Inc., Continental Can, Michigan Limestone & Chemical Co., Philipps Packing Co., Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.

Many other plans differ in a few details. Among those which we have observed are the following:

American Steel Foundries Co., E. I. duPont de Nemours & Co., General Cable Co., Hoode Co., Newport Rolling Mills Co., Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co., Viscose Co.

Notice that the Carnegie Steel plan is printed in a little gray-covered pamphlet. This is not significant at all. But it is interesting that there are so many gray-covered black-bordered pamphlets sent in from employees in other steel companies, many with the same square underneath the name of the company and the same provisions inside excepting for a change of date or place or number of representatives. Bethlehem and a few other steel mills have used a tan-covered pamphlet. Other companies following the content of these booklets have used a variety of sizes, shapes and colors.

Now, then, I want to refer just briefly to company unions in the automobile industry.

As examples of how employers have initiated plans through which they sought to influence the operations of the company unions, take the situation in the automobile industry. Here there were no company unions when the National Recovery Act was passed. They started at scratch.

They were aided and abetted by their trade paper, Automotive Industries. They ran an amazing series of articles.

July 15, "Is the Open Shop in Jeopardy?" by L. W. Moffett.

July 22, "Works Council Plan Won't Work as Negative or Defensive Expedient," by Norman G. Shidle.

September 30, "Works Councils for Automotive Workers?" by Norman G. Shidle.

October 21, "The Employee Representative Plan for Which Chrysler Workers Voted 5 to 1" (including the Constitution).

December 2, 1933, "A Critical Look at Article 7 (a) from the Employer's Viewpoint," by Joseph Geschelin.

December 9, "Have Employee Representation Plans a Place in the New Deal?" by Joseph Geschelin.

December 23, "meeting N.I.R.A. Requirements in Employee Representations Plans," by Joseph Geschelin.

The last article is, in many ways, the most interesting, for the author suggests how to make a company union plan legal, in these words:

It is evident after listening to the experience of those who have experimented in this field that while a successful employee representation plan primarily must meet the immediate practical needs of the situation, it must also be skillfully drafted so as to comply with the legal aspects of the plan as a contract between the employer and his employees. Of course, so far as to legality is concerned, it is recognized that under present conditions the employer is the only responsible contracting party and is the only one rigidly bound by its provisions. Nevertheless from a strictly practical point of view if the plan is drawn up so as to meet certain interpretations of article 7A of the N.I.R.A., the employer at least has the semblance of right on his side and is placed in a better strategical position in his dealings with regional labor boards or the National Labor Board.

The following additional suggestions are given:

In the light of interpretations of article 7A of the N.I.R.A., some experts in this field recommend the following guiding principles in the drafting of any new plan:

1. That the plan must first be sold to the employees.
2. That employees must be given time to study and consider a tentative draft of a plan before it is adopted by the company. Moreover, the employees should be given the opportunity to make suggestions and recommendations as to changes.
3. That it would be advisable to set up a constitutional convention to ratify the draft of the final plan and then submit the plan to a vote of all eligible employees.
4. That the plan should provide definite machinery for collective bargaining and make provision for a final decision on questions brought up before the conference. This definitely demands machinery for arbitration.
5. Restrictions on the qualification of employee representative should be very limited to avoid discontent.

Qualifications such as a long period of service, American citizenship, and so forth, may meet with considerable resistance.

After observing that there is no unanimity among personnel men as to the preferred type of plan, he states:

It is thought to be bad policy to permit employee representatives to meet privately since there is no control over the issues that they bring up and, also, because the group forms a majority opinion on any given issue, which is hard to change in subsequent arbitration.

But let us look at the plans themselves, the much publicized Chrysler Motors plan for employee representation, for instance. Mr. W. P. Chrysler "sold" this plan to his men with a long letter. Here is a telling paragraph:

I have enough confidence in the fairness of men to believe that when they know the facts and have an equal voice in deciding matters that concern them they will come to decisions that are fair and reasonable. It is for that purpose that I am proposing for your consideration a plan of employees' representation in our plants. This plan is described in a leaflet which each one of you will receive.

This plan sets out as its purposes:

This is a plan which provides an opportunity for the employees to have an equal voice with the management in deciding jointly all matters affecting wages and working conditions.

Now, how do the employees exercise that equal voice? There is no provision for the employee representatives to meet alone; they must meet with an equal number of management representatives appointed by the management in a joint council established in each of nine divisions of the company, or in joint committees of the council. All shop employees on the pay roll on the day of election are entitled to vote; they must, however, select as their representatives persons who are at least 21 years of age, United States citizens, are employed in the same election district of the shop, and have worked for the company 1 year. Otherwise, they vote for representatives of the workers' own choosing.

Now, suppose these Chrysler employees wished to elect some friend not employed in the Chrysler motor plant as their representative to meet with the management and present their grievances, as we understand they have a right to do under the provisions of the National Recovery Act, they are prohibited from doing so because of these limitations placed upon the selection of representatives.

Nominations (by secret ballot) and elections (from the two receiving the highest vote on the nomination ballot) are conducted by the employees themselves in accordance with the rules and regulations laid down by the joint conference (employees and management) and with only such assistance from management as may be requested.

A labor union for collective bargaining, between employees' representatives and management! It contravenes absolutely all the principles and provisions of the National Recovery Act.

These chosen representatives of the employees "shall be deemed to have vacated their office" upon severance of relations with the company, upon transfer from one voting district to another, upon appointment to supervisory position, or upon being absent for more than two consecutive meetings of the joint council or a joint committee unless such absence has been excused by the chairman of the meeting. This seems to be ample provision for disposing of any "troublemaker" among the representatives.

As in the steel company plans, the company appoints a special representative, known as "management's special representative", whose duty it is to keep in touch with both the employee represen tatives and the management and who represents the management in negotiation with such representatives.

This management's special representative acts as chairman of the joint council, but has no vote.

Employee representatives and management representatives have equal voting power. A two-thirds vote is necessary to decide any question. Obviously, then the employee representatives could be blocked in any action which they initiated. But, as if that were not enough, the constitution provides as follows:

To preserve the equal voice of employees and management at meetings of the joint council or its committees at which a quorum is present both employee representatives and management representatives shall be entitled to cast an equal number of votes.

The company provides "suitable meeting places for meetings of the joint council and its committees at its expense". Imagine the task of a plaintiff in a case when his lawyer is paid by the defendant. What chance has he to win?

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Green, I suppose the American Federation of Labor would object if in their conventions they could not pass any resolution affecting any economic situation, or their rights as workers unless that resolution both received the approval of the employers?

Mr. GREEN. Why, certainly. It is ridiculous, absurd, and yet that is in their representation plan. You have developed a perfect anology. That brings it out exactly. The company provides—suitable meeting places for meetings of the joint council and its committees at its expense, and employees serving as members of the joint council or its committees receive their regular average pay from the company for the time actually spent in serving on the council or the committee.

The route outlined for the adjustment of any matter which in the opinion of any employee of the company requires adjustment is:

(1) To the foreman in charge of the work;

(2) To the employee representative of his voting district who takes it up again with the foreman;

(3) To the management's special representative, who will help the employee representative and the foreman prepare a joint statement to be taken up with—

(4) The foreman's superior officers;

(5) To the joint council who may call the employee before it to give information regarding the matter under consideration and may go in a body with the management's special representative to any part of the plant to make an investigation "after making arrangements for so doing with the management's special representative." After complete investigation and full discussion, the joint council votes. The employees representatives and the management's representatives have equal voting power and a two-thirds vote is necessary to reach a decision. If a decision is not reached by the joint council at the second meeting following the meeting at which the case was first brought up, the matter goes—

(6) To the president of the company, who may confer with the joint council or any committee or any group of employee representatives. Within 10 days he must propose a settlement or refer the matter to—

(7) Arbitration; this consists of an employee representative selected by the employee members of the joint council, the president himself, and an impartial and disinterested arbitrator selected by these two. If the president and the employees' representative cannot agree upon an arbitrator, each selects one. If these two arbitrators agree, their decision is final. If they do not agree within 20 days, they select and call in a third arbitrator, and a decision of a majority of these three shall be binding in the matter.

It has been estimated by an officer of the compliance division of the W.R.A. that this procedure would occupy at least 100 days after the employee originally presented a matter for adjustment. Note, too, that at every stage of the procedure representatives of management are present, exercising that subtle control over decisions which is inherent in the power to pay and the power to discharge.

Senator DAVIS. From hearing the statements that you are making, Mr. Green, I take it for granted you are opposing that form of collective bargaining?

Mr. GREEN. Senator, I could be arrested for what I think about it and for what I would like to say about it.

The Nash plan in Kenosha, Wis., is exactly like the Chrysler plan, and the Nash plant is closed down today just as tight as it is possible to close a plant, where they had their company union plan in effect.

Mr. Nash, like Mr. Chrysler, sent a letter to the employees to sell this plan to the men. It is a long, 2-page letter with many of the same paragraphs as the Chrysler letter, but a more persuasive beginning and ending. The letter begins:

> Having earned my living by working in the factory in my earlier days, I believe puts me in a position to better understand the workmen's problems than the average person.

and ends.

> After familiarizing yourself with the proposed plan, I hope your decision will be to vote "yes," I am positive that if I were again at the bench in the factory and had an opportunity to join in this plan I should most certainly vote "yes."

I shall file a copy of the whole letter for the record if you wish it.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, Mr. Green.

Mr. GREEN. Here it is.

(The letter referred to by Mr. Green is as follows:)

THE NASH MOTORS CO.,
Kenosha, Wis., October 26, 1933.

To all Nash factory employees:

Having earned my living by working in the factory in my earlier days, I believe puts me in a position to better understand the workmen's problems than the average person; and in these days of unusual conditions, when there is possibility of misunderstanding and misrepresentation on matters of joint interest to you and the Nash Motors Co., I feel it important that you should know the truth at all times about everything concerning your welfare and happiness and your relations with the company.

I am proud of the cordial and friendly relations having always existed between our company and its employees, and I am very anxious that the same shall continue.

I would not be fair to you if I did not see to it that you got the real facts, and therefore, I am now proposing a plan which I believe will serve to do that thing and give you and the company a chance to sit down together and discuss and decide matters of mutual interest to all of us. I always have believed that if we could do this in a spirit of friendly understanding and confidence in each other, we would accomplish a great step forward in promoting and maintaining the kind of relationship we all want in this industry.

It seems to me that this company has now reached such a degree of understanding and mutual respect between employees and mangement that we can consider together practical means of giving effect to a plan which I believe will assure lasting cooperation, goodwill, and prompt, fair settlement of any questions that may arise.

I have sufficient confidence in the fairness of men to believe that when they know the facts and have an equal voice in deciding matters concerning them that they will come to decisions that are fair and reasonable.

It is for that purpose that I am proposing for your consideration a plan of employees' representation in our plants. This plan is described in a leaflet which each one of you will receive. I ask you to read it carefully, to study its mutual advantages, and then decide by secret ballot whether or not you want to adopt it.

You will find that this plan enables the individual employee to get a fair and prompt hearing by his supervisors, and if he cannot get a satisfactory settlement from them, then a review by joint council to which his fellow employees have an equal say with the management in disposing of the case.

The whole purpose of the plan is to promote such a relationship in our plant as to assure employees a square deal and encourage their willing cooperation in advancing the company whose interests concern every one of us.

Read the plan carefully. I am going to ask you to vote "yes" or "no" whether you want it.

In order that this election may be held under employees' auspices, entirely independent from management, the Ke-Nash-A Club, which as you know is an organization of the employees themselves, and has their confidence, has kindly consented to conduct election on the plan. If the plan is adopted, the first election of employees' representatives under the plan will also be conducted by that club. The elections thereafter will be conducted by the joint council.

If the majority of the employees say "yes" the plan will be put into effect and you will have an opportunity to nominate and elect representatives to deal with the management on an equal basis in discussing all questions that may arise.

This plan is a simple and clear method whereby we can mutually consider as equals all questions that vitally concern us in our relations with each other.

In offering this plan, I want it distinctly understood that every employee, regardless of his membership or nonmembership in any organization, has a right to participate in it.

After familiarizing yourself with the proposed plan, I hope your decision will be to vote "yes." I am positive that if I were again working at the bench in the factory and had an opportunity to join in this plan, I should most certainly vote "yes".

Respectfully,

C. W. NASH.

The Packard Motor Car Co. amended an oil aid association by having its employees vote on an additional R or representation membership. All employees of the company are eligible for this representation membership, but only those who have been on the pay rolls for 60 days may vote for representatives. The separate aid membership is concerned with insurance. The plan adopted by the Packard Co. is quite similar to the plan of the steel companies with a joint council and special committees. The plan is limited in that "The rules committee shall act only in matters especially provided for therein." This plan—printed in a blue booklet—was adopted in Detroit on September 22, 1933. Then the same plan was printed in a salmon-colored booklet for the seven plants in the vicinity of New York City. Pasted on the Detroit booklet was a statement:

> It is your privilege to go to your unit voting place in ——— department, on ——— afternoon on company time to apply for "R" membership and nominate candidates for representatives of your unit.

The Packard plan has an elaborate provision for guaranteeing the independence of representatives:

> Representatives shall be free to discharge their duties in an independent manner without fear that their individual relations with the company shall be affected in the least degree by any action taken by them in good faith in their representative capacity. To insure this result a representative shall have the right to take the question of an alleged personal discrimination against him, on account of his acts in his representative capacity, to the management representative, to the joint general committee, and to the president of the company.

A representative, having exercised his right in the consecutive order indicated n the next preceding paragraph and failing a satisfactory remedy for such alleged discrimination, shall have the further right to appeal to the Administrator of the National Recovery Administration or his designee. The company will furnish said Administrator with every facility for the determination of the facts, and his findings and recommendations shall be final and binding.

It will be observed that this refers to the workers' individual rights, and that it does not include the time-honored shiboleth in company unions that there shall be no discrimination because of union membership.

The General Motors plants have adopted employee associations. The Pontiac plan may be examined as a sample. This provides for voluntary membership of all employees of the manufacturing department; that is, voluntary for all employees 21 years or more, with at least 90 days of service and at least first papers. These employees choose their representatives from among the members of their own division with at least 1 year's service. They meet alone, but the factory manager must be notified of all meetings. Management is present only when requested. The meeting place is established by the works council subject to the approval of the plant manager. The company pays the representatives their regular earned rate, prints the ballots for elections, and elections are held on company time. In addition, the company will furnish a stenographer for any meeting on request.

The plan emphasizes that membership is voluntary, but it provides that only members of the employees association have the right to make a complaint to the works council with reference to wages, hours of labor, working conditions, or other appropriate subjects. Only members have a right to take out insurance and to participate in the company savings and investment plans.

There is a feature that I wish might be developed and considered in detail. Along with their company union plans in many instances they set up their group insurance plan and their death benefit plan, and, I think, in some cases, unemployment benefit plans, and they provide that members of this company union only will have a right to participate in the group insurance plans, death benefit plans, and so forth. In other words, they offer an inducement to the workers to come into their company union, and say that he cannot be a beneficiary under these plans otherwise. Then it specifically provides that only members of the employees association have the right to make a complaint to the workers council. If a man refuses to join their company union he cannot take up a grievance; he is out.

In cases of disagreement, appeal is possible all the way up to the general management of the company, who, it is said, "will take up the subject for consideration." That is what it says. When it is taken up with the management he will take it under consideration.

The Pontiac plan is one of the few which provides some regional organization. A general works council, consisting of the chairman of the works councils of all plants, will be formed to consider matters affecting all plants. They will meet in Detroit upon call issued by the management.

The Buick plan is much like the Pontiac plan but some provisions are more rigid. For instance, all expenses of the employees' committee are to be borne by the company but before they are incurred they are subject to the approval of the factory manager. This plan may be amended by a two thirds vote of the employees' committee, but it cannot be dissolved; as long as the N.I.R.A. remains in force, the plan is "subject to the act and to all codes or regulations promulgated therewith." This plan contains the statement that membership in the Buick Employees' Association is purely voluntary, and "not discriminatory in any form, as provided for in the N.I.R.A."

The plan of the Motor Wheel Corporation is much like the Buick plan, with appeal to the general manager of the Motor Wheel Corporation. Its two divisions meet separately every month and together the next day. This plan provides:

> If any person discontinues his or her position with the company by request or for personal reasons, and is not satisfied that he or she has been treated fairly, he or she may make a complaint direct to the employees committee or to the personnel director.

The Kelsey-Hayes Wheel Corporation plan is much like the Motor Wheel plan, but minutes of all meetings of committees must be approved by the chairman of the factory council and also by the works manager or his representative. The plan may be amended by a two-thirds vote of the factory council, subject to the approval of the management. Appeal in this company runs from the employee to the employee representative to the foreman to the plant superintendent to the standing committee to the management to the president or vice president, whose decision shall be final. This is one of the few plans to date that "Any agreement entered into between the factory council and the company and any determination of any matter within the jurisdiction of the factory council shall be binding to all members of the association." On the other hand, this plan includes a statement that there shall be "no discrimination under this plan against any employee because of race, sex, political or religious affiliations, or membership or nonmembership in any organization."

The plans of the Fisher Body Corporation and the Ternstedt Manufacturing Co., a unit of the Fisher Body Corporation, contemplate an employees' association with no provisions for employee representatives elected to the works conference in each plant to meet alone. Informal meetings with a plant manager may be held at any time, regular meetings of the workers' conference are held once a month, and the plant manager or his representative will sit in in an advisory and consultant capacity.

Minutes of all meetings and transactions are kept by a secretary whose expenses are paid by the company. The company control extends to elections also; the plant manager appoints the temporary election committee and the management will furnish the temporary election committee a secretary upon request. Ballots are counted under the direction of the election committee and a representative of the management.

The plan may be amended only on the unanimous agreement of the works conference and the plant manager.

This plan includes the no-union discrimination provision, but it has become a "right to belong or not to belong to any lawful society, fraternity, union, or other organization."

There is an appeal to the central office in Detroit, but no provision is made for a joint meeting of the representatives of the 14 units of the Fisher Body Corporation.

The Chevrolet plan is much like other General Motors plans. Matters affecting all the Chevrolet plants will be referred to a general works council consisting of the chairmen of all the works councils.

The Hudson Motor Co.'s method of enlisting members in its company union was much resented by the workers. All men relieved after the seasonal shut-down had to take out company insurance. The card through which they signed up for this insurance automatically made them members of the company union. Can anyone say that these workers had a free choice?

In all of these plans the companies pay the representatives of the workers to attend the meetings. They pay the cost of administration. They pay for fees and clerical expenses, and they pay for the maintenance of records. I repeat again, what chance has a plaintiff submitting a grievance to the court to win his case when his attorney is employed by the defendant?

Senator WALCOTT. Mr. Green, are there any company plans that you think come under the regulations of the N.R.A. that you would approve? Take the General Electric, for instance; what would you think of that?

Mr. GREEN. The General Electric plan is a company-union plan that perhaps, if you would make comparison between that plan and others, might be a shade better, but it is just as objectionable because it is a company-controlled union directed by the company and company influenced.

Senator DAVIS. What is the difference between the General Electric plan and the Standard Oil plan?

Mr. GREEN. I do not think there is a great deal of difference. There may be a little difference, but I could not tell you, Senator, at the moment. I would have to make a careful comparison in order to determine it.

The CHAIRMAN If any of the witnesses have luncheon engagements they are excused until 2 o'clock

You may go ahead, Mr Green Dr. Haas will be the next witness at 2 o'clock, and following him will be Mr. Hillman.

Mr. GREEN. Other automobile and parts companies mentioned by our members as starting company unions since the N.I.R.A. are: A. C. Spark Plug Co., Auto Car Co., Beaver Roller Bearing Co., Bendix Aviation Co. in South Bend, Ind., Cadillac Co., D. L. Auld, Hudson Motor Co., Seaman Body Corporation, Studebaker, United Motors, Warren Nash Co., Wilcox Rich plant.

I think I have talked enough about automobile company unions for you to see that they are much alike in spirit and purpose but not altogether alike because different groups seem to think up different diabolical ways of control.

After all the plan is a small part of the story. This is best illustrated in the Budd case. This is a very interesting case and has attracted wide attention The company union adopted in this company as soon as the Automobile Workers' Union started its organization drive was an innocent-looking plan. Five management representatives were to attend all meetings with no vote but subject to call for advice or consultation. Officers would be glad to attend on occasion. Each employee representative was to be paid $2 per month for attendance at such meetings as might be found necessary.

The procedure for adjustments was couched in flowery language: "The democratic traditions of the company", and the expectation "that shop executives will give employees complete adjustment." Of course the following paragraph could not be taken very seriously by any workers, but then it is to be said that they signed up for this plan without knowing what the plan was to be.

> Recognizing the serious and delicate responsibility which lies with management concerning the maintenance of an efficient working force in adding when we increase business and decreasing when there is shrinkage of business, and the disciplinary responsibility that arises from any dereliction of duty on the part of employees, it is understood that employees will cooperate to the fullest of their ability with the management in improving the personnel and in maintaining the highest standards of character and efficiency among our personnel.

What has happened in the working out of this Budd plan has been emblazoned in every newspaper in the country. I am discussing it in another part of my testimony.

Like the automobile companies, the rubber tire companies have been active in starting company unions. Goodyear has had a well-known plan for many years. Many others have started plans since N.I.R.A. I have not time to discuss them today, but I want to call your attention to the matter of the Goodrich Co.'s provisions for compensation of representatives. So far as I know, this is the most exaggerated financial provision of any company-union plan. I do not wonder that it has created serious problems of divided loyalties for many workers. The Goodrich Cooperative plan provides "compensation" for services under this plan as follows:

> To a representative, $15 per calendar month.
> To the vice president of the general committee, to the secretary of the general committee, and to each member of the wage committee, $20 per calendar month.
> To the chairman of the wage committee and to the chairman of the welfare committee, $25 per calendar month.
> To the president of the general committee, $30 per calendar month.
> A representative serving as a committeeman or officer shall be entitled to receive only one salary compensation.
> A representative shall receive, in addition to the amounts stipulated, compensation for the time spent in attending an approved or regular committee meeting held during his regular working shift and necessitating his absence from work. The amount of this compensation shall be at the rate of 75 cents per hour.

Would you expect a representative earning $15 to $30 per month in addition to hourly pay for time spent at meetings to vote against his company in the interests of his fellow workers? The company is gambling that he will not. This is the sort of thing that makes the provision in section 5 (4) necessary. It certainly should be made unlawful for an employer to contribute financial support to any labor organization by compensating anyone for services performed in its behalf.

Here is a case, Senator, where the money of the corporation is being used lavishly, as I have quoted, to finance, foster, establish, and maintain company union. What hope have the workers under such a plan? Is it any wonder social unrest is arising, that discontent is evidenced on every hand, and that the workers are insisting upon exercising the right to strike against such intolerable conditions?

To anyone at all familiar with the labor history of the United States, it is not surprising that opposition to section 7 (a), to independent organization of the workers, to free choice of representatives, and to collective bargaining, is concentrated in the largest plants, in the industries most closely organized in trade associations. In other words, those industries in which the workers have never been able to gain real bargaining power are now most determined to prevent such gains under the recovery program.

The most conspicuous refusals to cooperate with the entire labor policy of the recovery program have come so far from two of the most powerful industries in the country—steel and automobiles. Both these industries have always been definitely and aggressively anti-union. Their antiunion policies are maintained now notwithstanding the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

This allegation is supported by the facts recorded in the already notorious Weirton case. Let me review that case very briefly. It tells the story and proves the point, that the National Labor Board, if it is to meet such a powerful adversary with any hope of success, must have the legal powers and the legal strength the bill introduced by Senator Wagner proposes to confer upon it.

The Weirton Steel Co., as you doubtless know, has plants in Weirton and Clarksburg, West Virginia, and in Steubenville, Ohio. In June, the company suddenly announced the formation of an employee-representation plan; copies of the bylaws of the plan were circulated and the employees were urged to vote, under the supervision of the employers, for officers of the newly formed company union. The code resulted in a reduction of wages for many of the men in the plant and in protest one department went on strike.

A committee from the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor, attempted to meet the management, only to be met with the statement that the company would not receive anyone associated with that organization. At this direct refusal of the company to comply with section 7 (a) a strike occurred in the various plants of the company. The case came to the National Labor Board in September 1933. That Board was told by the company that "the settled policy" of the company was "to maintain an open shop, and not to contract with the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers."

Nevertheless, the company agreed, through Mr. Weir, that the National Labor Board might supervise an election among its employees to determine whether the independent or the company union had a majority. The company demanded, however, and secured a delay of some 2 months before that election was to be held. Upon the assurance of the Board and the company that the election was to be held, the strike was ended. The men went back to work—at least those who were permitted to do so went back to work. So far they had gained nothing. But they had faith in the National Labor Board and in section 7 (a).

Mr. Weir gained a peaceful settlement of the strike and a long delay in further action. Mr. Weir knew what he was doing. In a recent issue of the Business Week (issue of Dec. 16, 1933, p. 9), under the caption of "Labor Board Challenged" it was stated:

> Nobody concerned is very naive about the advantage that Weirton has taken of the 2-month interval. * * * Mr. Weir knew that, if he could put up a good company union front, he was in a strong defensive position to meet any attack through N.I.R.A.'s collective bargaining section, source of all the mandatory power the Labor Board can claim.

But when the time came for the election, Mr. Weir had changed his mind. He was no longer willing that the National Labor Board hold the election which would give his employees the right to express their own desires on the persons who should represent them for collective bargaining. He was unwilling to comply with the law, despite his signed agreement that he would comply.

True to the traditions of the steel industry, Mr. Weir informed the Board he would conduct his own election. Despite this, the Board sent representatives to Weirton in December, at the time agreed upon. But Mr. Weir did not see fit to permit the representatives of the Board to act. He held his own election and, naturally enough, elected his own representatives. In defiance of the law, in complete disregard that the law required of him a different course of action than that pursued by the steel industry in the past, Mr. Weir pursued his own way.

President Roosevelt issued an Executive order strengthening the National Labor Board after a group of workers from Weirton had come to Washington to lay their case before the President himself. The steel industry, as an industry, protested publicly the action of the President, and made known its support of Mr. Weir's position. Steel joins issue, in other words, with the administration.

Since President Roosevelt had said that, if a substantial number of Weirton employees desired an election under the supervision of the National Labor Board, one should be held, the Board sent representatives to Weirton, W. Va. Every chance was given to Mr. Weir, and through him, to the steel interests to play fair.

Early in February the Board requested access to the company's pay rolls, as in no other way could they secure the names of employees eligible to vote, which was essential to the holding of an election. The company refused the request of the Board, an agency of the Government. The refusal concluded with the statement:

> We must decline to furnish you with any pay rolls and will not permit company property to be used for the purpose of holding an election.

This case was finally turned over to the Attorney General on March 1, 1934, some 5 months after it came to the National Labor Board. How long must workers wait for the realization and enjoyment of their ordinary, common place, inherent, legal rights? These men, starved, persecuted, driven from pillar to post, what must be their state of mind?

The case was turned over to the Attorney General on March 1 by Senator Wagner. Presumably, the Weirton Steel Co. still displays the Blue Eagle—think of that. What must a corporation do in order to forfeit its right to display the Blue Eagle.

Presumably, it still enjoys all the benefits which the steel industry itself has proclaimed has been conferred upon it by the recovery program, and if there is one industry in America that has conferred upon it great benefits, that has profited perhaps more than any other by the National Recovery Act, it is the steel industry of the Nation.

Now, the National Labor Board, because it lacked power to deal with just such cases of stubborn, reactionary employers, who are determined to maintain the old order despite all appeals, has been forced to a long series of hearings, and attempts at mediation, with a tremendous loss of time, and consequent losses to the workers involved. The Weirton Co. (and the entire steel industry) proclaims by this case that it has no intention to permit its employees to enjoy the rights conferred upon them by section 7 (a). This industry can never be expected to yield to moral suasion. It has demanded a showdown. The answer of the Government to that demand must be the adoption of the bill we are discussing today.

If no other argument were offered in support of this bill, for the enactment of this measure into law, than this one page, it ought to be sufficient to inspire and influence the Members of Congress unanimously to vote for the enactment of this Wagner bill.

This is a notorious case. It has been supported by the steel industry. It is the steel industry's case. Let me point out that Mr. Weir made his agreement for an election with the members of the National Labor Board, and upon that Board at the time that he made this agreement sat the representatives of industry, Mr. Walter Teagle, of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey; Mr. Gerard Swope, of the General Electric Co.; Mr. Kirstein, representing a large merchandising company; and every one of these men voted unanimously with labor and the Senator, who is the chairman and myself, that this election should be held and Mr. Weir made a solemn agreement with all of these men and then flaunted it and refused to carry it out.

If I had my way I would pillory Mr. Weir as a public enemy, broadcast it throughout the land, for his refusal to carry out his agreement and abide by the law of the land, which has brought intense suffering into the homes of families. It has caused children to go hungry, women to suffer mental agony as well as physical distress.

At the present time he stands as a challenge to the Government and it is inconceivable to me that in accepting that challenge the Government will surrender to one corporation or one industry.

But what will happen before the courts finally decide? Where will be the cases of these workers who under section 7 (a), in the exercise of their rights, joined a union, committed no other crime, if that could be called a crime, no other offense, if that could be called an offense——

The CHAIRMAN. "Asserted no other right would be better."

Mr. GREEN. We would better never have passed section 7 (a) than to delude men and women into the belief that they could exercise certain rights and then pursuing that policy bring suffering into homes of working men and women.

A second powerful industry to challenge the entire recovery program is that of automobiles. This industry, like steel, is traditionally and fanatically antiunion. The automobile challenge comes in the form of the Budd case. I want to give you a brief outline of that case.

In July, the workers of the Budd plant formed an organization which is known as the "United Automobile Workers, Federal Labor Union, No. 18763," also affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. With a union formed, they asked the company to deal with them. This was entirely logical in view of the provisions of section 7 (a). But Mr. Budd did not conform with the act. He refused to recognize the union's right to speak for his employees and instead proceeded to set up his own employee representation plan, in a planned and deliberate attempt to defeat the act.

He asked his employees to vote for representatives under his employee representation plan before the plan itself was revealed. By no stretch of the imagination can this be considered free choice of representatives. The employees had no chance to vote upon this plan. They voted in the dark, because they had jobs which they must keep as long as possible. Even in view of this, however, a strike occurred in the plant in November because of the continued stubborn refusal of Mr. Budd to meet the representatives of his employees who were freely chosen by those employees.

A decision of the Philadelphia Regional Labor Board was ignored by the company; the case came to the National Labor Board, which decided that an election should be held within 30 days, and that the striking workers should go back to work at once. Again, on the faith of the Board's decision, the strike was ended.

It is pathetic, it is tragic, the faith that these workers have in the Government and in the National Labor Board. They believe implicitly in it. They hoped that justice would at least be done. They gave up the advantage they had gained.

But Mr. Budd refused to rehire the vast majority of the men. Some 800 of them are, in fact, still unemployed, although many new and inexperienced men have been added.

A statement issued by Senator Wagner on the position of the National Labor Board was, in part, as follows:

> The essential part of our decision was that the men should be reinstated and an election held within 30 days, supervised by the National Labor Board, to choose representatives for collective bargaining. This would have been the same sort of election as the Board has supervised in many plants and mines. It is a method of settlement against which there can be no valid objection by any employer sincerely desirous of carrying out the letter and spirit of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. Mr. Budd's excuse for an objection was that he had an election on September 7 through a plan of representation, which he had posted up in his plant on September 1, the day after a substantial part of his workers had enrolled in a labor union.

That election to which Mr. Budd professed such loyalty was the one which was arranged by the company without consulting the employees, and without informing the employees on what they were voting. The election itself may have been fair—that was never the question. The issue was whether or not the men should enjoy the freedom conferred upon them by section 7 (a). Mr. Budd was and is, apparently, determined that they shall not.

I need not remind you that after 4 years of incredible suffering and hardship, after 4 years of job hunting and unemployment, workers are today in a position in which it is difficult, if not impossible, to defy the employer, no matter what his demands may be. That is why section 7 (a) must be made clear, unambiguous, and enforceable; that is why company unions must be placed outside the law; that is why the National Labor Board must be given the enforcement powers which it has not yet had, and which the present bill will give it. We must have a law which cannot be defied as Mr. Budd has defied section 7 (a); we must have a National Labor Board which cannot be ignored, as Mr. Budd has seen fit to ignore the National Labor Board.

Where is any desire for fairness or cooperation either with the employees or with the administration to be seen in any of the actions of Mr. Budd? Is there anywhere an indication that the Budd Co. wants to play fair with its employees? That it wants to play fair with the administration? And the entire issue is that the company refused to meet and deal wth union representatives; that it denied the workers the right specifically granted them in section 7 (a). Four months have been spent in delays, heartbreaking to the employees concerned, and to the union. This delay is due very largely to the fact that the National Labor Board does not have the power to enforce the decisions which it considers right and fair in the case.

Meantime, the Budd Co., like the Weir Co., displays the Blue Eagle, the symbol of the "new deal"; meanwhile, it enjoys Government contracts and Government protection and the benefits of the code. Meanwhile, a tragedy has taken place in Philadelphia directly traceable to the stubborn, unyielding, uncomprising attitude of this country, a tragedy that touches the infant as well as the mother, a tragedy that stalks abroad through the business sections as well as in the home. Eight hundred men walk the streets because they tried to take advantage of their legal rights.

Can a government, so big and democratic as this, permit such a condition to exist? We believe that this bill proposed by Senator Wagner will at least go a long way to remedy such situations as this.

Now, I must hasten. I do not want to give the impression that steel and automobiles are the only industries in which open violation of the National Industrial Recovery Act has occurred. If this were true, the situation would not be as serious as it is. Unfortunately, there are many employers only too willing to follow the lead of the powerful industries in the evasion of the law. I want to give you brief outlines of two other cases, to show how far the intention and the purpose to evade the act has been carried.

One of the two cases I want to cite is that of the Harriman Hosiery Co., of Harriman, Tenn. On July 1933 a union was formed among the employees of this company. On the same day a number of the employees active in the formation of the union were dismissed—many of whom had been with the company for a long time. The representatives of the union attempted to meet with the management, to establish some kind of working basis of cooperation with the management in what they considered, rightly, to be the spirit of the N. R. A.

They were met with a statement from the general counsel of the company to the effect that "we will not agree at any time to recognize the union, arbitrate on propositions we are unable to agree upon, or to enter into contracts individually or collectively" with the workers. Of course, a strike occurred. There was no other alternative for the workers but to strike. The walk-out occurred in October. Since that time, the Atlanta Regional Labor Board and the National Labor Board have made every possible effort to bring about some kind of agreement. The company has blocked every move by its unwavering refusal to cooperate in the attempts to find a solution of the problem.

The employees have tried to cooperate with the administration. At the request of the National Labor Board, and upon assurance that some kind of settlement could and would be reached, the strike was called off. The company refused to take back most of the strikers. They secured an injunction against picketing or any other activity of the union, and prohibited their striking employees from congregating on the streets or in any way getting together. Some 100 men and women employees were arrested and thrown into jail under the injunction. The representatives of the union who came before the National Labor Board to present their case were, upon return to Harriman from Washington, immediately put in jail. Five days after the National Labor Board had asked that the strike be terminated, upon an understanding that the company would attempt a settlement, the general counsel of the company, in a letter to Senator Wagner, stated:

The company has consistently taken the position that it would not recognize a union in its plant; that it would not enter into written contracts, either with individuals or representatives of a group of its employees; and that it would not submit any question on which it and its employees or their representatives could not agree, to arbitration.

Meantime, the workers were forced to depend upon the Federal Emergency Relief Administration for food and clothing and fuel. Because the industry refused to support the recovery program, the Government was forced to assume responsibility for its employees. These men and women and children suffered hunger and cold because they demanded their rights under section 7 (a). Harriman is a town in which the employees of the company still live in a state of feudalism. They enjoy few of the privileges of freemen and free citizens. They cannot win their battle alone. The odds against them are far too great. They must be freed, they must be protected in their rights. On February 2, the National Labor Board denounced the Harriman Co. as determined "to perpetuate discord, foster industrial unrest and obstruct the forces of recovery." It is such companies at which the bill under discussion today is aimed. It is such companies who will respond to nothing but legal force, resolutely applied. It is such companies who are doing all in their power to destroy the entire recovery program and reduce us to the chaos out of which we are struggling. As a further proof, if further proof is needed of this, let me quote one last statement of the Harriman Hosiery Co. The general counsel for that company, on January 4, 1934, before the National Labor Board stated the position of the company as follows:

We are perfectly willing to enter into a unilateral proposition * * * and will then post it on our own bulletin board as a rule of regulation of our plant, enforceable against us.

Could a more perfect example of failure to comply with either the spirit or the letter of section 7 (a) be found? Could any better argument be found than the statement that I have just quoted for the amendment of section 7 (a)?

There is one other case I wish to describe very briefly. This is the case of the National Lock Co. of Lockport, Ill. On August 31, 1933, some 800 workers in this plant refused to work unless their rights to organize were recognized. The company immediately obtained very drastic injunctions against the employees, and set about the formation of a company controlled and instituted union. When the Chicago Regional Labor Board attempted to intervene and find a basis for settlement, the company proceeded to secure an injunction against the members of that Board restraining any member of that Board from conducting a hearing, making a report, or making any statement on the case. They did that. They restrained an instrumentality of the Government. The injunction was granted and the Board was forbidden to function and did not function.

Senator DAVIS. Was that a board appointed by the National Labor Board?

Mr. GREEN. That was a board created by the National Labor Board, the Regional Labor Board located at Chicago, a board made up with an equal representation of employers and employees and an impartial chairman.

Senator WAGNER. Under the Recovery Act?

Mr. GREEN. Under the Recovery Act.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Robert Hutchins, president of the Illinois University——

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Robert Hutchins, president of Chicago University, is the impartial chairman of the board.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the legal proceedings which terminated in the injunction raise any question of jurisdiction and authority?

Mr. GREEN. Senator, I am unable to tell you because I have not a copy of the application here, but it was granted by a local judge.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the ground?

Senator WAGNER. A question of jurisdiction.

Mr. GREEN. I think it was a question of jurisdiction.

At any rate they got it, and the regional labor board was prevented from functioning. The 800 people are still out and starving unless they are fed by the Federal and State Governments.

Senator WAGNER. What was the date of that injunction approximately?

Mr. GREEN. It was shortly after August. I think it was in September.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have a reference to it in the record.

Mr. GREEN. The company secured this injunction restraining the members of this board of conducting a hearing. The employees on strike were prohibited by one injunction from coming within one half mile of the plant. Surely the action of the company in securing the injunction against the regional labor board cannot be looked upon as in any way consistent with the spirit of the recovery program.

Then the company secured an injunction against the regional labor board restraining it from coming anywhere near the plant.

Now, they were guilty of deception, too. The company, in an effort to mislead its employees, posted on its bulletin boards a garbled quotation of section 7 (a). Their version of section 7 (a) omitted that portion of clause 1, which states that the employees choice of representatives shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of the employers, and clause 2 of section 7 (a) was quoted as saying that "no employee" shall be required as a condition of employment to join any "organization" instead of "any company union." The entire action of the company, indeed, shows studied hostility to the purposes of section 7 (a). The general counsel of the company in a letter to the National Labor Board said, among other things:

> We realize, as this Board must, that you have no jurisdiction to do anything with the company. But this company ought not to be subjected to the annoyance and humiliation of having a report made in any way criticizing it. It will create industrial discord in the plant and in the city of Rockford.

And this company flies the Blue Eagle, notwithstanding the fact that the injunction was granted restraining the regional labor board from functioning, the National Labor Board called them in, employers and employees, to Washington. We tried our best—honestly and sincerely tried to settle that controversy, offered to let them hire these people back as they needed them, creating a preferential list of the employees and selecting new employees from this list, and until all of these old employees who had worked for them for years were returned.

They positively and absolutely refused even the mediation services of the National Labor Board.

If industrial peace means only that employers of labor are free to deny the law in any manner they see fit, if it means that employees are not to have freedom of action, then we do not want, and we most certainly shall not have, industrial peace. There is nothing to any industrial peace, as far as I am concerned, so long as these workers are denied the exercise of their rights under section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act.

What we do want is real industrial peace founded upon freedom from restraint or coercion on the part of either employer or employees, founded upon the cooperation of employers and employees, and guarded and—when necessary—enforced by the Government.

Now, I have submitted the case. It has been submitted as an argument in support of this bill. I have tried as best I could to present to this honorable committee the underlying reasons why this proposed bill should be enacted into law. Remember these men who are suffering, persecuted, discharged, because they will not join these company unions, are red-blooded men; they have pride; they are the men who make the munitions when we go to war; they are skilled workers of the country; they are the men who bear their breasts for our Nation; they are red blooded; they are proud; they resent fraternalism. They want nothing conferred; they are workers, human beings; they want to stand on a basis of equality with the management, with industry, and face them across the table and talk to them straight in the face about their common problems.

They know they cannot do it if they are submitted to the conditions of the company union; they do not want a suit put to them, brought to them, and placed on them. Their destiny is in their own hands and they want to be free, and I urge with all the authority I possess, speaking for millions of working men and women, that Congress enact this measure into law.

Now, if I may, I wish to offer a statement here that was presented by our attorney in which he defends the constitutionality of the act absolutely, and some minor suggested amendments.

(The statement referred to by Mr. Green is as follows):

SUGGESTIONS CONCERNING SENATE BILL 2926 AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES BILL 8423 TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD, ETC., AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

I. CONSTITUTIONALITY

It may be urged that the bills now pending in Congress to create a National Labor Board (being not of emergent but of permanent nature) are unconstitutional because their provisions are not limited in applicability to interstate commerce but are applicable to purely intrastate commerce and industry; that is to say, commerce and industry confined within an individual State.

It seems to be clear, however, that the power of Congress to legislate in matters of this sort arises out of provisions of the Constitution other than the interstate commerce clause.

Section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution provides that: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government * * *."

Recent history and present conditions in many countries of the world, all of them within the knowledge of well-informed men (and of which the courts and legislatures will take judicial notice), clearly show the tendency toward, either (1) the preservation of a republican form of government; or (2) creation of dictatorships.

It is also perfectly clear, from recent and present experiences, that the preservation of industrial democracy is essential to the preservation of a republican form of government.

The whole purpose and tendency of these bills are to preserve industrial democracy; and if this be admitted it is clear that the Congress has the right to enact these bills into law and that they are valid and constitutional.

NOTE.—Examples of present conditions are to be found in Russia, Germany, and Italy, where absolute dictatorships have been created. The creation of such dictatorships has been coincident with the complete destruction of labor unions and the rights of laborers as recognized in republican countries and even in monarchies. The clearest example of this is found in the recent developments in Germany, where labor unions have been destroyed by the ipse dixit or edict of the sole dictator, Hitler.

See also preamble to Constitution that it is adopted "in order to * * * promote the general welfare * * *."

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS

In section 2 of the bills (lines 10 and 11, p. 2, S. 2926 and lines 9 and 10, p. 2, H. R. 8423) it is declared to be "the policy of Congress" to do certain things.

It is suggested that this should be changed so as to read "the policy of the United States."

It is further suggested that section 2 of the bills be amended as follows:

After "Sec. 2", strike out the word "The" and insert "Whereas the", and continue the section as contained in the bills to and including the word "welfare" on line 10 of page 2 of S. 2926 and line 9 of page 2 of H. R. 8423.

Strike out the following words, namely: "It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress", and insert in lieu thereof: "It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States."

Then continue the said section as contained in the pending bills.

It is further suggested that this entire section be redrafted (there being no substantive changes) by inserting at the beginning of section 2 of the bills the following paragraph, based upon the so-called "Anti-Injunction Law" (U. S. C., title 29, sec. 101) and also embodying the first above-suggested change, so that the whole section will read as follows:

"SEC. 2. Public Policy in Industrial Disputes Declared.—In the interpretation and application of this act and in determining the powers, jurisdiction and authority of the National Labor Board hereby created, and of the courts of the United States, as such powers, jurisdiction, and authority are herein created, defined, and limited, the public policy of the United States is hereby declared as follows:

"Whereas the tendency of modern economic life toward integration and centralized control has long since destroyed the balance of bargaining power between the individual employer and the individual employees, and has rendered the individual, unorganized worker helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract, to secure a just reward for his services, and to preserve a decent standard of living, with consequent detriment to the general welfare and the free flow of commerce; and inadequate recognition of the right of employees to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing has been one of the causes of strikes, lockouts, and similar manifestations of industrial strife, obstructing commerce and imperiling the general welfare; therefore, in order to remove obstructions to the free flow of commerce, to encourage the establishment of uniform labor standards, and to provide for the general welfare, by removing the obstacles which prevent the organization of labor for the purpose of cooperative action in maintaining its standards of living, by encouraging the equalization of the bargaining power of employers and employees, and by providing agencies for the peaceful settlement of disputes, the following provisions are hereby enacted:

"Provided further, That no provisions of said acts or of the so-called 'Prevailing Wage Scale Act' approved March 3, 1931, shall be construed to be repealed by any of the provisions of this act."

Mr. GREEN. Now, in addition, I wish to suggest an amendment to the section which provides for the creation of the National Labor Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment may be printed in the record also.

Mr. GREEN. It is this, I have not got it prepared but I will submit it.

Instead of the Labor Board being composed of 2 representatives of employers, 2 representatives of employees, and 3 from the public, I suggest that it be balanced on the basis of an equal representation of employers and employees with an impartial chairman, a man of the caliber of the distinguished Senator from the State of New York.

Now, I believe that that will create a better state of mind among the working people and the employers of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you would have the Board constituted with one man who would be the chairman and representing the public interests?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And 2 or 3 representatives of the employees and 2 or 3 representatives of the employers?

Mr. GREEN. That is right; equal representation.

The CHAIRMAN. Would they all be full-time officials?

Mr. GREEN. That is a matter that I leave to your discretion. As it is, Senator, those of us serving on the National Labor Board give our services free and we are glad to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. You may draft an amendment along that line and we shall be glad to have it for our deliberations.

Mr. GREEN. It appears to me also that the selection of these men ought to be carefully safeguarded. I am not sure as to how that can be done, but I understand that under your proposal, Senator, members of the Board, the appointees, are to be confirmed by the Senate?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. That is a very fine safeguard. We are thinking about the future and we want to be sure that members of the Board are really representative of industry and really representative of labor.

Now, there is one other section, and that is where you limit wage agreements to 1 year.

Senator WAGNER. I myself am already going to suggest to the committee that that limitation be eliminated.

Mr. GREEN. That completes my presentation of the case, and I thank you sincerely for your patience.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you, Mr. Green; you have made a comprehensive presentation.

Senator DAVIS. How many have joined company unions since the passage of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. GREEN. Well, the report is, Senator, that the company unions have increased 169 percent. That is the most recent report, and that means about between 1,600,000 and 2,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is in the record, Senator.

Senator DAVIS. What has been the gains to the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor since the passage of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. GREEN. The membership of the American Federation of Labor has increased to perhaps in excess of 3,000,000 since the passage of the National Recovery Act.

Senator WAGNER. From what low point, Mr. Green? What was your lowest point in membership in the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. GREEN. I think we had gone down to a paid-up membership—you see, our membership is always on the basis of paid up. Of course there are always a large number of the members of the American Federation of Labor who are not represented in the paid-up membership, but I am referring to paid-up membership. Our lowest point, as I recall it, was 2,400,000 or 2,500,000 in that neighborhood.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Green, I want to know if I understand the background of your agitation in favor of this bill.

The National Recovery Act was a law passed by Congress for the purpose of bringing about industrial recovery and was characterized at the time as a partnership between Government and industry to help industry, is that correct?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In that act were many concessions made by the Government to help industry, and concessions were made which industry was demanding to remedy the ruthless competition that was then prevailing?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, then, there was not only a definition of what the Government was ready and willing to do to help industry by permitting it to organize and suspending the antitrust laws in order to bring about general prosperity, but there was an enunciation of the rights of employees in industry?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And those rights are contained in section 7 (a) of that act?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Those rights can be summarized as follows: First, that in every agreement, code, or license issued under the N. R. A. there should be asserted the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, and do it through representatives of their own choosing?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the outstanding and notable right enunciated in favor of the employees in that legislation?

Now, in addition to that, it was agreed and asserted that the employees should be free from interference and coercion of employers or their agents in three particulars; first, in the designation of their representatives?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Secondly, in self-organization; and, thirdly, in their concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, you say, as a member of the Labor Board, authorized to interpret and promote and protect these rights, that your experience has been that these provisions have been violated and that the rights granted by the Congress have not been generally exercised because there was no power in the act to punish or to bring force upon any employer to protect the rights granted in this act in favor of the employees?

Mr. GREEN. You have stated the case, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Now, you say that this pending bill protects these rights that Congress has already defined, reiterates them, and tends to put teeth into the law that will compel employers to defend and protect these simple but valuable rights that were named in section 7 (a)?

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I understand the background.

Senator WAGNER. May I just ask one other question? Under the law, as the Senator stated, industry has the right to organize and to perform such organizations which before the anactment of the act they were not able to organize for the purpose of exchanging economic information and agreeing upon certain business practices which heretofore have been prevented by the antitrust law?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. They were given those extraordinary privileges and they were allowed to organize, which they have done, so that they are better organized than ever, and I want to ask whether labor has interfered with business in business organizing?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly not, but on the contrary, we have stated that we believed that employers of labor were entitled to and should be permitted to exercise all their rights under the provisions of the National Recovery Act. As you know, the procedure is that industry must organize first in order to present a code, an industrial code of fair practice, because the code submitted must be a code submitted by an organization truly representative of the industry.

Then, when the code is adopted a code authority is created, made up of representatives of the industry, to administer that code, to punish those in the industry who engage in unfair trade practices, and maintain prices, if you wish.

The CHAIRMAN. And the unfair practices were rampant and threatened the destruction of industry?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Now, they have appropriated to themselves all the benefits of organization, and we hold that the Government has been the organizer of industry. Now, industry says, "Yes, we enjoy all the rights conferred by the Government, even to the suspension of the antitrust laws, but labor shall not organize, as provided for in section 7 (a)."

The CHAIRMAN. Again, Mr. Green, we thank you, and I think it is quite a compliment to you that so many people in the room here have remained until you finished your lengthy address.

We stand adjourned until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 1:15 p. m. a recess was taken until 2 p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Haas.

STATEMENT OF DR. FRANCIS J. HAAS, NATIONAL LABOR BOARD, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name for the record, please.

Dr. HAAS. Francis J. Haas, Director of the National Catholic School Social Service; member of the National Labor Board since October 6, 1933; a member of the Labor Advisory Board, National Recovery Administration, since June 20, 1933.

The CHAIRMAN. What group do you represent on the National Labor Board?

Dr. HAAS. I am a labor representative, so appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, we will be very glad to have your views in regard to this bill.

Dr. HAAS. Before beginning, may I say a word with reference to the question that you raised this morning, Senator Walsh, regarding the word "initiate" in section 5, paragraph 3, of the bill before you. As I recall, you stated that a professor yesterday testifying said that the word "initiate" was open to objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gist of Dr. Slichter's testimony was that he could conceive of employers really rendering a valuable service to their employees by saying, "Now, men, you are not organized and you ought to organize." That is the thought. This bill, he feared, would prevent a right-minded and sympathetic employer from making even the suggestion that you ought to organize.

Dr. HAAS. It is to that point, Senator Walsh, that I should like to address a few remarks. In my opinion, the word "initiate" is very essential to this section. It is inconceivable that a right-minded employer would initiate a labor organization which would run counter to his interests. It seems to me that we need not have any fear about that kind of an employer. What the bill proposes to do is to meet a natural situation where a large number of employers—taking employers by and large—seek to start a labor organization that will promote their own interests, and it is that condition that the bill wants to outlaw and definitely to prohibit.

I do not know of a single case coming before the National Labor Board in which an employer initiated a labor organization that was lawful. I do not know of a single case where an employer initiated a labor organization that was not to his own interest and that he could not control, and inasmuch as that particular passage is directed at the movement known as the company union movement, and inasmuch as that is a very menacing condition, it seems to me that this section should not be weakened by the elimination of the language in paragraph (3) of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. We are pleased to have that observation.

Dr. HAAS. The bill before you seeks as its ultimate purpose to increase purchasing power. There is no recognized authority who does not hold that inadequate purchasing power caused the precipitous business decline from June, 1929, to June 1933, and that increased purchasing power is essential both to recovery and permanent prosperty. With the aim of the proposed legislation, there is unanimous agreement.

To effect increased purchasing power, the bill defines certain acts as unfair labor practices and sets up machinery to prevent or restrain them. There are, of course, persons who object, and strenuously, to the proposed machinery, but, in my opinion, this machinery is the only possible method of increasing buying power now and of maintaining it, and thereby putting the country on a lasting basis of prosperity. Briefly, the machinery is necessary first for the emergency and second for the long pull.

First, the bill should be made a law because at present workers are exercising their rights under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and, because they are exercising them, in numerous establishments, they are being discharged individually, and in some plants in whole sections. The normal result is a strike. Since June 1933 over 900,000 workers went on strike and at least 9 out of every 10 strikes had their origin in organization activity under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

The obvious effect of strikes is decreased buying power. In a recent case before the National Labor Board, 600 workers went on strike because some of their number had been discharged for union activity. During the suspension of work, the total pay roll loss was over $100,000. And this, as you observe, is a very small case involving only 600 workers.

In passing, may I say that my observation in different parts of the country and my experience as a member of the National Labor Board have convinced me that the almost unanimous support which the Nation is giving to President Franklin Roosevelt is due mainly to the enactment of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act. When that law was passed, workers could not do other than they did. They turned with confidence to a Government that had the courage to break with the past and give legal sanction to the inherent rights which all possess to participate in making regulations to govern them.

Section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act declares that workers may exercise rights which nature gives them, the same as our Federal and State constitutions declare that they may exercise rights which nature gives them to elect their representatives in Government, whether local or national. Now, the fact is that since June 16, 1933, some employers have by evasions and subterfuges voided the plain meaning of section 7 (a), and, by precipitating strikes and lockouts, curtailed purchasing power and helped to retard recovery. The bill before your honorable committee would outlaw and restrain such evasions and subterfuges and by giving section 7 (a) the meaning and effect intended by the Congress, would consequently accelerate recovery. So much for the emergency feature of Senate bill 2926.

Second, the bill should be made a law because we must look to the future. We dare not merely pull the car out of the ditch and run it for a year or two to go into the ditch again for another 4 or 5 years. As responsible authorities we may not take this short range view of things.

In laying the foundation for permanent industrial peace and prosperity, the dominant aim must be to increase purchasing power constantly. This result, in my judgment, can be obtained only by assuring workers a larger and larger share of the national income, and this in turn can be obtained only by unhampered, unrestrained collective bargaining. This is the long run purpose of the bill before you, and I beg to express the urgent hope that it will be enacted into law.

There is no better way of planning for the future than to look at the past. What was the typical employer-employee relationship from the beginning of our industrial history down to the enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act? It was a contract, if it may be called such, which the average employer considered to affect only himself and his employee.

It could be represented by a straight line—A B. It was thought that no one had any interest in the wage contract except the employer and the individual employee. The larger interest of the public, including fellow employers and fellow employees, was not held to be at stake.

Customarily, the wage relationship prior to June 16, 1933, was referred to as an individual bargain. In point of fact, among the overwhelming number of 48,000,000 workers in the United States, there was no bargaining whatsoever. True, for approximately 10 percent there was union collective bargaining. Add to this the individual bargaining of a small percentage of nonunion skilled mechanics, but this was restricted for the most part to the busy seasons of the year. Outside these two groups, there was no bargaining at all of whatsoever nature.

The great mass of workers were, at the time they were hired, simply told what they would get. Very frequently, they were not even told. After employment, when piece rates were changed, the foreman simply announced the new rates. He could announce rates as low as he chose, limited only by the shortage of workers standing ready to take jobs. Briefly, the typical employer-employee relationship did not have even the appearance of trading or bargaining. The employer simply notified the worker what wages he was to get and the hours he was to work. The result was that competition ran riot and workers were without sufficient means to buy the goods they produced. Depression was inevitable.

To repeat, the relationship was a strictly bipartisan one. No account was taken of the effects of the unregulated hours of one worker on all others. No account was taken of the effects of the low wages of one worker on all others. No account was taken of the relation between low wages and general consuming power. The result could only be what it was—every 7 or 8 years, the machine systems practically stopped and the heavy hand of depression was on the people for 3 or 4 years.

Add to this fact that during the last two decades there was a tremendously increased productivity of machines along with totally inadequate power to buy their output, and the picture is complete. This was the condition in which the Nation found itself in the summer of 1929 and through which it has passed with bitter suffering and privation for over 4 years.

Turning to the future, it is necessary to take a totally different concept of the wage contract. We must abandon the notion absolutely that the wage contract concerns only an employer and an employee. It concerns everybody else. The amount of wages that a man is paid and the hours that he works certainly affect him, but they affect every other worker both as worker and as buyer. They affect the employer hiring the worker, but they affect also other employers. In other words, instead of regarding the wage contract as an A B relationship represented by a straight line, it is to be regarded as an A B C relationship represented by a three-sided surface.

The practical question is: How can the three parties at interest in the wage contract be adequately protected? The answer is: Either by government, primarily, or by collective bargaining primarily. The first method, that of government, which in practice means minimum wage and maximum hour laws, is, from a practical standpoint, utterly inadequate. The outstanding defect of government as an instrument of social justice is that it cannot get enough money appropriated to police and enforce proper labor standards. Other defects are present, but this it seems is the principal one.

The alternative is genuine collective bargaining. Here we have the certain and assured method of increasing and maintaining buying power. The proof is universal experience and observation. It is not necessary to compare earnings of organized workers with those of the unorganized. Invariably those of the organized are higher. Even in cities where there is only one unionized trade the earnings of the unskilled in those localities are much higher than those of the unskilled in cities where there is no organization at all.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to appear to be reading a lecture to the committee, and if you feel so inclined to interrupt I would be glad to consider your questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Dr. HAAS. What are employers most opposed to and what do workers most want? Employers are by no means opposed to company unions. In fact, they foster and finance them. They are most opposed to unions officered by representatives freely chosen by employees. On the other hand, employees looking to their true interests, want genuine unionism more than anything else. With the exception of workers who have a property interest in pension and beneficiary funds under company unions, workers are emphatically opposed to employer-dominated organizations. The answer, then, to the question: What will best protect the legitimate rights of workers and increase purchasing power, is unhindered, free labor organization. When we have the courage to accept this answer and proceed on the basis of it we will be on the way to industrial peace and permanent prosperity.

I have come now to the provisions set forth in the law—in the bill, the law as I hope it will be.

True collective bargaining has certain essential qualities. It requires certain conditions to be met. They are: (1) Freely chosen representatives are to be recognized and dealt with for the purpose of coming to an agreement; (2) representatives of workers are to be chosen free from company domination; (3) no means may be used to undermine the worker's organization; and (4) agreements entered into are to be respected. These conditions are defined and safeguarded by the bill before you for consideration.

(1) Clearly, collective bargaining requires an employer to recognize and deal with representatives of his employees. The bill before you declares refusal to do so an unfair labor practice. Section 5, paragraph 2, meets the most common evasion of section 7 (a) of the N.I.R.A., which has been resorted to during the past 8 months. The section reads:

> To refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees, or to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

Again and again cases have come before the National Labor Board in which the employer flagrantly violated section 7 (a) but took refuge in the claim that he observed the language of the statute. He made the defense that he met, received, and conferred with representatives of his employees. In one extreme instance an employer came to the National Labor Board and held that he had observed the law, although it was clear that he has had no intention of coming to an agreement. He had held conversations with the workers' representatives extending over several weeks and climaxed a 2 days' negotiation with them in Washington by throwing them along with their attorney in jail on their return home.

Paragraph 2 of section 5 of the bill is therefore of utmost importance, especially that passage which requires the employer "to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements" with representatives of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, as a member of the Labor Board, I assume you dealt only with cases where there were controversies between employers and employees?

Dr. HAAS. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any opportunity to observe the extent to which employers really are striving to carry out the spirit of section 7 (a)?

Dr. HAAS. Yes, we have had examples of employers before the National Labor Board who labored under a misunderstanding and through mediation of the Board, after a half-day, or a day, or two days of explanation and conference, they saw the point and signed up the agreement. Outside of the National Labor Board, of course there are many employers who are observing the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Did all kinds of agreement, industrial agreements, come before your Board, or only those where there were controversies?

Dr. HAAS. I am not sure that I understand your question, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your Board only dealt with controversies that arose between employers and employees?

Dr. HAAS. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not deal with the incorporation in the agreements of the Codes, the labor provisions?

Dr. HAAS. The National Labor Board did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not. So you were continually hearing——

Dr. HAAS. Trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. Trouble, yes; misunderstandings and difficulties between employers and employees. Are you able to give us any information as to the extent to which employers are really living up to the spirit of section 7 (a) and cooperating with their employees so that they may enjoy the rights prescribed therein?

Dr. HAAS. Well, if I were to speak only as a member of the National Labor Board, from that standpoint, apart from my experience outside of the National Labor Board, I should say that in numbers the majority of employers want to observe the law. I say that from the standpoint of number of employers, because some employers employ very many more workers than others, and consequently the number of employers is not so important. I dislike to make this comment, but I am entirely convinced by the facts before me, that the important, the powerful employers of the United States are not complying with or showing a proper attitude toward the labor provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

The CHAIRMAN. That sentiment seems to coincide with that of other members of your Board who have testified.

Dr. HAAS. (2) To make collective bargaining adequate, workers must be free to choose their representatives. This is so elementary that it requires no proof. Surely no one would say that a trade association may not choose whatever representatives they wish, either members of the association or persons outside the association. This is all that workers ask for in asking freedom to choose whatever representatives they wish.

The commonest restriction on workers' freedom to choose their representatives is that practiced by the company union. The impropriety of the company union system is clear when it is remembered that the typical company union scheme requires workers to choose as their bargainers persons who are paid, in whole or in part, by the employer with whom the workers' case is being bargained. In a recent case before the National Labor Board involving over 4,000 employees, the labor adjuster and the two attorneys for the workers—that is, representing the welfare or the company union scheme, on its property, these persons received half of their compensation from the company and half from the employees.

Incidentally, this particular welfare company union plan is regarded in the community as a very successful and proper arrangement between employers and employees. I do not want to take your time going into the other defects and injustices involved in the company union plan. I mention this point only, that is, that the bargainers for the workers are paid by the man with whom the workers' case is being settled. The ineffectiveness of such representatives in bargaining for workers is apparent. The need of freedom from employer domination is patent and this freedom the bill before you seeks to guarantee.

(3) Collective bargaining to have any real meaning requires the employer to refrain from all discriminatory practices which would undermine organization. The most effective weapon which the employer possesses to disrupt a union is of course dismissal. Others of a more subtle character include discrimination as to wage or hour differentials, advancement, demotion, hire, tenure, reinstatement, division of available work. All these, the bill declares to be labor practices which are unfair, and provides means for their prevention.

(4) Collective bargaining requires that a contract entered into should be carried out. This statement may sound like a truism, but within it lurks a slightly controversial question. It is the matter of the union shop. The bill provides, and in my opinion very properly, that when a union contract is agreed upon between the employer and a union, this contract with necessary safeguards, is to be regarded as a lawful contract.

So much for the purposes of the bill. But it does not stop with a recitation of purposes. It sets up machinery to carry them out. There is provision for new powers to be conferred on the several District Courts of the United States. On these there is little need to dwell. The main consideration here is the establishment of a national industrial tribunal, to be known as the National Labor Board.

The National Labor Board as proposed is necessary to make collective bargaining an actuality. Only such a Governmental agency can prevent unfair labor practices and maintain equality of bargaining power in the wage contract.

The functions of the proposed board are two: conciliation and mediation, and limited arbitration. The first is of utmost importance. The parties to an industrial dispute can come to the board, and with the advice and experience of trained conciliators, have their respective rights clarified and composed and thereby avoid what may result in costly industrial warfare. Moreover, title III of the bill creates in the Department of Labor the United States Conciliation Service.

The object of this title is to strengthen the existing services in that Department, which since last August has been of tremendous assistance to the National Labor Board created by Executive order on August 6, 1933.

The second function is arbitration. It is to be indicated that the Board is given no compulsory arbitration power, but one rather of a voluntary character. It will be competent to act as arbitrator in labor disputes only when the parties submit their controversy to the Board, and when the Board accepts their submission. The bill in no way abolishes or curtails the right to strike.

Another function of the Board is one that is nowhere provided for in the bill, but one that it will exercise with uncalculable benefit to the public interest. It is the silent preventive work that the Board will do in the way of educating disputants to settle their differences between themselves rather than go to the expense and inconvenience of appearing before the Board. Moreover, in the course of time, the Board will develop a body of precedents and these will act as guiding principles in effectuating mutual agreements.

In the immediate present and perhaps for some time to come, two important problems must be met. One is the matter of bringing collective bargaining negotiations to a conclusion. The other is the determination of workers' representatives. The National Labor Board is necessary to meet both.

As already indicated, since last June not a few employers have, by unduly protracting negotiations and even by refusing to do anything more than talk with employees' spokesmen, clearly violated the National Industrial Recovery Act. Manifestly, this is an unfair labor practice and should be dealt with accordingly. The National Labor Board is necessary to correct and prevent this evil.

Again, the question of the identity of workers' representatives, who they are, and what authority they have is full of complications and large with strife and controversy. The common-sense expedient is to settle such questions through the medium of the secret ballot. The National Labor Board has in the brief period of its existence held more than 97 elections for such purposes. Identical powers are to be vested in the Board provided for in the present bill.

In conclusion, therefore, the bill before your Honorable Committee should be enacted into law because its ultimate effect is to increase purchasing power both in the present emergency and in the future, and because it establishes the means to effectuate these necessary results.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Doctor, very much. I appreciate your assistance in this matter. We will try to hear Mr. Hotchkiss, Mr. Ogburn, and the present witness, Mr. Hillman. The others are excused until tomorrow morning.

STATEMENT OF SIDNEY HILLMAN, PRESIDENT, AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA, AND MEMBER OF THE LABOR ADVISORY BOARD

The CHAIRMAN. How many workers are there among the Amalgamated Clothing Workers?

Mr. HILLMAN. About 135,000.

The CHAIRMAN. How long has that organization been in existence?

Mr. HILLMAN. Since 1914, as a national organization.

The CHAIRMAN. How many branch unions have you?

Mr. HILLMAN. Probably about 120 local unions.

The CHAIRMAN. Affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. HILLMAN. Yes; affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. HILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee.

Senator WAGNER. I think before you begin, Mr. Hillman, if it does not take too long, I would like to have you explain to the chairman some of your social activities outside of the ones you have indicated.

Mr. HILLMAN. I am director of 2 labor banks, 1 in New York and 1 in Chicago. Off the record, we have not applied to the R.F.C. for any assistance all during the depression. I am also associated with the Amalgamated Housing Corporation, which comprises cooperative housing in the city of New York for close to 1,000 families, and also, so far, we have met all our obligations and there is no receivership in sight.

The CHAIRMAN. How large are the banks that you referred to? What is the number of depositors and what is the amount of deposits?

Mr. HILLMAN. We had at one time in the New York bank over 120,000 depositors.

The CHAIRMAN. That is larger than the Chicago bank?

Mr. HILLMAN. Yes; that is larger than the Chicago bank.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be very glad to have your views on this bill.

Mr. HILLMAN. I will be brief. The splendid presentation by Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, really covers the ground as far as the factual case is concerned in reference to the need of this additional legislation.

I am wholeheartedly in support of the bill, because this bill, when enacted into law, will give section 7 (a) reality. Section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, in my judgment, is the very heart of the whole National Industrial Recovery Act. The purpose of the National Industrial Recovery Act is to increase the purchasing power and give a more equal distribution of income among the large masses of the people. It is my judgment that if not the whole reason for the depression, at least the major part of it is caused by the low level of wages that has prevailed even during the time of prosperity.

As a member of the Labor Advisory Board, sitting in on the hearings for the promulgation of Codes of Fair Practice for industries, I have found that wages have gone down as low, in many industries, as 5 cents an hour. We found in some cases they went down as low as 2 cents an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that prior to 1929?

Mr. HILLMAN. No; this is since the N.R.A.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not follow you to the extent of your observation that the depression was caused by low wages.

Mr. HILLMAN. Lack of purchasing power.

The CHAIRMAN. I always thought the depression was caused more by the extent of ruthless speculation and gambling and the inflation of capital.

Mr. HILLMAN. It is my judgment that viewing the total amount of money that went into wages in this country and that was spent, that we could not possibly support the mass production that we are equipped for.

The CHAIRMAN. You certainly could not support the extent to which capital was inflated and expanded. I refer particularly to the extent to which industry consolidated and reconsolidated, and piled up enormous capital, which of course affected the workers in their wages, and also affected the value of the securities.

Mr. HILLMAN. Of course that is quite effective, but taking the current industry, the information available is that the average person of over 18 years of age bought less than one suit of clothes a year.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you talking about prior to 1929?

Mr. HILLMAN. Prior to 1929.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HILLMAN. Which obviously shows the lack of purchasing power in the country.

Senator WAGNER. And the reason they did not buy is because they did not have the wages.

Mr. HILLMAN. Of course we all love to be well dressed, if nothing else. It is the lack of purchasing power. I have been sitting in as a member of the Labor Advisory Board in one industry just a few days ago, and the figures presented showed that in 1929 the average wage for the whole industry was 25 cents an hour. That was a very substantial industry, employing probably between 50,000 and 60,000 workers.

Now, the National Industrial Recovery Act is for the purpose of at least putting a bottom to the low wage levels, and, through the provision for maximum hours, to create employment.

Taking out section 7 (a), I am satisfied in my own mind, especially with the experience of the last 7 months, there will be no enforcement of the labor provisions of the Code, and if section 7 (a) is not properly backed up, I am very fearful that the whole N.R.A., the great achievement of the last 6 or 7 months, may degenerate into purely monopolistic organizations, protecting themselves against unfair competition, and that the main purpose of the National Industrial Recovery Act, providing for the labor provisions of the Act, will fall down just because of lack of enforcement.

I would like to go on record and say to you, Mr. Chairman, that in my experience with the men in industry, the largest number are anxious to cooperate with the Government. They want a constructive way in dealing with the problems of industry.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the employers?

Mr. HILLMAN. The employers. They all recognize that the old method must mean ultimate bankruptcy for all of them. But the trouble is that a small group can always create a situation where the people who would like to do the decent thing are helpless. We are getting today a great number of complaints from a number of employers that the codes are not properly enforced, and because of that it creates again unfair competition.

Now, section (a) in my judgment, should have been sufficient. The language is clear, and anyone who desires to cooperate with the Government can just read the language of the section and know that it gives labor the right to organize. But our experience is that starting with the minority today, but spreading and becoming soon the majority action in the industry, that they are trying to find ways of violating the letter and the spirit of the law.

The bill to me—I would not say that every word is perfect and that there isn't any room for changes or amendments, but it gives substance to the law, it creates a board that will be an impartial board, three impartial representatives of the public, which will work toward the proper confidence of industry and labor, and then two representing industry and labor, so as to give, as the Secretary stated yesterday, proper contact and intimate knowledge of what is going on in industry.

The people who are opposing it know what the purpose of the law is. It is the same group of people who have opposed and denied labor the right to organize in the past. I represent, as president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, an industry where 75 or 80 percent of the employers are under a contractural relationship with our organization.

There has not been a single strike or disturbance, to my knowledge, since the N.R.A. in that 70 or 80 percent of the industry. But you find a great deal of strife in that 20 percent who are still opposing not merely the N.R.A., the law, but would like, in my judgment, to have a situation where they do not have to live up to the labor provisions of the code. Only yesterday, 1,200 or 1,400 people walked out in the city of Cleveland in one plant, merely on account of section 7 (a). Now, here is a company that had a company union 15 or 20 years ago; then the depression of 1928–29 came and they wanted to reduce wages, so they abolished the company union. They did not ask for any vote on it. Then they proceeded making reductions. Since the N.R.A. they called the company union back again. Discharges have taken place, and a couple of days ago another person was discharged because of activity in organizing the people into an independent organization, and as a result there was a walkout of about 1,200 to 1,400 people.

I can see a real danger ahead of us, as President Green has pointed out this morning, unless we can establish governmental agencies that will give protection to labor, and protect their rights under the bill, that we are heading for a great deal of industrial unrest that is uncalled for..

I believe that the act, when enacted, and when the employers will recognize that they have to deal with the law as is, that we are going to enter into an era of cooperation in industry instead of strife, when this bill becomes a law. It is because of that, and because the bill makes proper provisions for guaranteeing labor the right to strike, a right that labor cannot possibly give up under any conditions, when it is given the proper governmental machinery, I believe the strikes will be very much minimized, just because there will be a relief for the workers when they have grievances to take up.

I conceive that the bill at this time is necessary and it ought to be treated as an emergency measure, as emergency legislation, to protect and safeguard the workers under the Industrial Recovery Act,

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand your contention, Mr. Hillman, it is that you, as an observer, and as a member of the Labor Board, have observed about 20 percent of the industries of this country seeking to avoid the provisions of the N.R.A., and in obtaining that objective to avoid the provisions of the N.R.A. they have given the appearance of supporting section 7 (a) by organizing unions in their plants, but they did it solely for the purpose of appearing to support the law, and not for the purpose of giving the employees the independent rights that that provision gives them.

Mr. HILLMAN. The real purpose is to maintain their own open-shop policies under the cloak of company unions.

I don't know of any company union—I say I don't know of any, but there may be some—where the basis for the whole organization is not coercion. These people have got control of the men's jobs. Of course, any indication is a threat, a coercion.

The CHAIRMAN. It is gratifying to hear you state that in your judgment the largest percentage of the employers of the country desire to live up to the spirit of the law and would welcome legislation that would compel all employers to treat their employees equitably and justly.

Mr. HILLMAN. Exactly, Mr. Chairman. But I insist that the whole industry be required to do the same thing. After all, the basis of unfair competition, in a major part of the industry, is low wages that some manufacturers can enjoy because of their power to control labor, and because of that it creates an unfair competition. If competition is to go on, and I believe there is room for it, it ought not to be done at the expense of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. A well-organized union in an industry would insist upon the provisions of the code which relate to hours and wages being enforced.

Mr. HILLMAN. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. And therefore it would make for uniform wages and uniform working conditions in all industries and remove the element of ruthless competition that has been so injurious.

Mr. HILLMAN. Exactly. Many instances have come to me where people have complained about the violation of the labor provisions in the code which is the law for the industry, and then they have come pleading to the people that they lodged the complaints with to withdraw them because they knew they were going to be discharged.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Hillman. Mr. Hotchkiss.

STATEMENT BY WILLARD E. HOTCHKISS, PRESIDENT, ARMOUR INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY, CHICAGO

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hotchkiss, will you give us your full name?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Willard E. Hotchkiss.

The CHAIRMAN. Your present occupation or profession?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I am President of the Armour Institute of Technology, Chicago. I do not represent anyone except myself.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that institute?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. It is an engineering school, a 4-year undergraduate engineering college.

The CHAIRMAN. You are here in your personal capacity?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I am here on an invitation. I do not know who suggested that I be invited, but I am here.

Senator WAGNER. I did.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I am very thankful, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hotchkiss, we will be glad to have your views.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I hope being here with Mr. Hillman will not induce me to make a speech. I have quite often, as he knows, made one after he made one.

I think I ought to give a little excuse for being here. I was secretary of the Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board during the war. I was executive secretary of President Wilson's Second Industrial Conference in 1920. Between 1920 and 1925 I was director of the National Industrial Federation of Clothing Manufacturers, whose business it was to carry out the agreement with Mr. Hillman's union. So in that capacity I have represented employers that were working with the union. Last April, I think it was, Mr. Green did me the honor to write me. I think he wrote a great many other people in reference to this section 7 (a), which everyone, of course, recognized, anyone who had any dealings with the labor movement, was a very important part of the act, naturally, and he expressed anxiety in reference to the actions being taken, and I think the answer to the letter that he wrote was counseling caution. I raised the question at that time whether the labor movement, as it was at that time constituted, was prepared to digest an extremely rapid unionization of that part of the industry which was not then unionized.

Now since that time things have happened that have removed a part of my anxiety, by all odds the most important part of it. My peace of mind on that subject is the incorporation of the Almalgamated Clothing Workers of America into the A. F. of L. movement. Another one is the revival of membership in the United Mine Workers. Now there is a reason for that aside from the benefits which I think will come from injecting such leadership as represented by Mr. Hillman into the movement.

It seems to me that the bulk of the industries that are open-shop industries, so-called, with or without company unions, at the present time are industries in which unionism will have to be on the basis of an industrial union as distinguished from a craft or trade union. I just cannot see the automobile industry working with the carpenters on one issue, and right next door the machinists and all of the different craft organizations it would be necessary to work with. I think the tendency, while it has not gone as far as I would like to see it go, I think the tendencies toward recognizing that fact within the labor movement itself, has been very noticeable during the past 6 months, and I sincerely hope it will continue.

Now I realize that a man who had his active connection with labor 7 or 8 years ago is likely to seem like a bit of ancient history, when it comes into the discussion of this. I remember when we were working over this industrial board, Mr. Oscar Strauss was a member of this commission of which Secretary Wilson was chairman. Mr. Strauss is one of the finest men in the world, but he was always talking in terms of 1912, and it was 1920 at that time, and sometimes it was not quite in keeping. He was a delightful man. I am just afraid I may be talking in terms of 1920 or 1925, when I was working with Mr. Hillman, but I am going to be very frank.

I would like to see the main issue to which this question is addressed, absence of compulsion, settled. I do not think there should be coercion. I would like to see it settled in such a way that it would commend itself to the great body of employers represented in this 80 percent that Mr. Hillman speaks of, and all those who are dealing with unions at this time. I am just fearful if this act passes in its present form, that the result may be to precipitate more strikes than it will save necessarily, during the next 6 months.

It occurs to me that if there could be complete inquisitorial authority given to find out, in a given situation, whether there was coercion or not, and you could have a body of people representing distinctly organized labor with competent scholarship at the present time—and I have that man in mind, namely Mr. Wolman—a board that would have at its disposal a man like Mr. Wolman—let us take another professor, I am more or less of a professor myself—take a man like Mr. Slichter of Harvard University, and then let us take somebody that has been associated with an open-shop industry, whose opinion the community values on this subject, like President Stanley King of Amherst——

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad you have faith in Massachusetts.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Mr. King is not a citizen of Massachusetts, he is a citizen of the world—if they could have power in the meantime under the Board—I am not trying to rule you out, Senator, I think it ought to be under your Board—but if they could have full power to get a deliberate, well-developed orientation in all the facts, and then bring this bill up at the next session of Congress, with such modifications as might come in the meantime, I would be frank to say I would feel a little easier about it. Maybe I am old fashioned. Maybe my reaction is the result of working in a situation that was current 5 or 6 years ago. I know how very fast we have been going. I think we are going in the right direction, but I am very, very solicitous about the same thing Mr. Hillman is solicitous about. I am solicitous about the N.R.A. program, and I think we have got to find some way or other of trying to avoid what seems to me is likely to be an epidemic of strikes this spring. Of course, we probably shall not be able to avoid it altogether. We hope we can do things better than our fathers did, but usually when recovery starts there are strikes. There have been in the past.

Now I am a little solicitous about this particular measure. I do not pretend to have studied it, Senators, in its entirety. I received the copy you sent me on Saturday. I read it with a good deal of care—and I am not a lawyer—but I should dislike to see the group of people who are represented by men like Mr. Hillman, come to look to the Government instead of to Mr. Hillman's organization for their primary protection.

Government standards must, in the nature of things, be minimum standards, and when you enforce minimum standards there is a great danger that you will have maximum standards. I am solicitous not for the present, but for the future, in some regards, in respect to the definition of an employee.

We have a right wing and a left wing in our labor movement at this time. I think it is wholesome that we should have a right wing and a left wing. I do not think there is any particular reason why we should not have a wing that is considerably a left wing. Suppose we have a left wing strike and those people are refused by people who are in good standing with the regularly constituted unions? I am a little afraid that definition of "employee" leaves room for a little change to protect them. Not being a lawyer I say that with a good deal of hesitancy, but I think that point should be safeguarded with a good deal of care to be sure you do not get a different kind of coercion there that will not permit a normal evolution of the labor movement.

Now, as I say, these are just impressions that come out of the long handling of situations somewhat similar to these that we are talking about. Certainly it would be well for the clothing industry, if it were possible that the other 20 percent could be represented by Mr. Hillman's organization.

I do not think there is any question but what we have industries here in this country that are in that condition. Certainly there were a great many so-called company unions long before the N. R. A. was ever passed that were phoney. There is no question about that. I think there were some that were sincere. I think there were some that represented a constructive effort, that might have been ill-advised, that might have been trying to get something that they could not get.

I think I know the firm to which Mr. Hillman refers in Cleveland. The management of that firm has a good deal of different orientation today than it had 10 years ago, or 15 years ago. It had a sort of idealistic orientation at that time.

It seems to me that we want to make haste, but we want to make it not too rapidly. So I am frank to say, if we could get some way of dealing with the subject effectively, the subject of coercion, so that section 7 (a) could be enforced as reasonably well as these things are usually enforced—I do not expect perfection, and I do not believe anyone else does, in the enforcement of a law—and I think we should spend a little more time on the drafting of such sections as the employee sections, and the sections that have to do with what constitutes fair practice.

It is a ticklish thing to create a new set of offenses in the law. It seems to me a little more time should elapse, and a little more study should be given to it. I do not claim to be an authority on the subject. I came here because I was invited, and I am glad I came.

The CHAIRMAN. It is gratifying to have you feel free to make any suggestions you choose.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Certainly.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Hotchkiss, you suggested a sort of an inquisitorial body. May I ask you to explain this?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Sometimes when the law does not pass in the form it is originally intended some very good results are secured by starting something going.

Senator WAGNER. We welcome constructive criticism, as you know.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. That is my concrete suggestion.

Senator WAGNER. This is what I am not clear about. Supposing this committee does investigate, and discovers that in a plant there are 10,000 workers, and the 10,000 workers claim they have no opportunity to organize, they are not afforded the facilities for organization, the moment they join an outside organization they are dismissed, their job is in jeopardy, and they want a free election in which they can determine their choice. Now you inquire, when you find that to be a fact, "without any power what can be done?"

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Hasn't the Board at the present time power to supervise an election?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; but supposing the employer says, "You cannot hold an election, we will not permit you to hold an election?" I am giving you actual cases now.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I think it should have authority to see that a fair election is held.

Senator WAGNER. That is one of the powers provided for in this bill.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I am not saying I would throw the whole bill in the wastebasket pending further investigation. My opinion is that you have power to supervise an election. I do not think the time has come to attempt outright to put the power of the Federal Government behind the condemnation, willy-nilly, of the company unions. I think you have got to focus attention, for the present, at least, on the question of whether the employees did have opportunity to express themselves, and I would like to see the power of the Government put in to ascertaining the matters of fact, and seeing that fair administration does take place. I think it is somewhat shorter than going on to the details.

Senator WAGNER. If you want to keep the workers reasonably satisfied and do not want to intensify this unrest, you cannot leave these things suspended in the air. I have in mind four large employers of labor now, all of whom say, "No," to a mere election which the workers ask so that they may determine their representatives, and I know one instance where there were over 100,000 men involved.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I think you have either got to repeal 7 (a), or else give the workers complete power to hold elections without coercion.

Senator WAGNER. Do you think there ought to be a repeal of section 7 (a)?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I say in testing out these things you have got to see that there is a fair election. I will grant you that, but I think there is a good deal more in the bill than that.

Senator WAGNER. Now you take the case where the company-dominated union exists, the worker would have no choice. This legislation only affords a worker an opportunity to make a choice. It is up to him to choose. As a matter of a social and economic problem, do you think it is desirable to have the employer dominate the instrumentality that is set up to protect the worker?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I think if you have a fair election he cannot dominate it, but it seems to me at this time the thing has to have a chance to grow. Now the company union movement has had a mushroom growth since the N.R.A., but there were a lot of company unions before that time. Of course, as I said before, some of them were phoney—most of them were. I think more of them, perhaps, did not think the problem through. They said, "We want to get along with the employees."

The CHAIRMAN. You mean "employers."

Senator WAGNER. You heard this morning a number of employee representative plans, as they call them, under which the worker is limited in the choice of his representative to one that has been employed there for a year, of a certain age, and all that.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. No; you cannot do that here.

Senator WAGNER. Then it provides in the end, if you ever want to amend this constitution, you have got to get the assent of the employer.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. That was fought over in 1920. The language "representatives of their own choosing," means anyone they choose.

Senator WAGNER. I know what it means. I am trying to have you see our side of it. These workers and the masses come to us and they say, "What are we going to do? We are helpless here. We have got to work or starve here. You say we have the right, but we are not permitted to exercise it. What are we going to do?" They went to the President here the other day.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Isn't a question of speed there an important consideration, whether the board can have authority to go in there and act speedily?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; but then we have the other situation, after the election is held the employer says, "I won't deal with these men. I don't care who they elect. I won't deal with them."

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I realize it is a big issue there, I realize it perfectly well, but I still feel and fear that bad leadership will result in unfortunate reactions on the employer's side as well as any side.

Senator WAGNER. I understand that.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I do not feel that anything should be done that will precipitate that at this time, if the issue can be met.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Hotchkiss, here is one case I know of, here is one instance where 30,000 men will be satisfied if they are simply permitted to have an election where they can, without any coercion, intimidation, or anything, select their representatives. A strike is threatened because that is denied to them. The employer says, "We will not permit these elections to be held." Now we are powerless to do anything about that. Do you say that ought to remain that way?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. No; I don't say that.

Senator WAGNER. In other words, we are trying to prevent strife here which is imminent, if there is not some improvement in the law.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I think the law at this time could concentrate on the question of the freedom of election, the enforcement of the result, it could concentrate on that one point and cut out considerable detail at this time, and then get something of the picture from a somewhat longer range than the few months. After all, there has been a lot happening in the last 6 months. In the long run I would like to see a labor movement in which the workers would look to their unions for support, rather than the Federal Government. I would like to see that, because I think, in the first place, that not only will the Federal Government not be perpetually as efficient in doing that final job as probably the unions can be themselves—probably I have got a little too much Mr. Gomper's philosophy there—but I think in the long run the tendency will be for standards imposed by the national organization to be minimum standards. I do not think that should be done.

Senator WAGNER. Mind you, we do not intend to interfere with their freedom, we simply say as American citizens they are entitled to be free men, they are entitled to be on an equality in their bargaining power with the employers. It seems to me that is the duty of the Government, to see the citizens have their freedom.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. But I think there is real danger that some of Mr. Hillman's friends might be looking to the Government instead of to Mr. Hillman.

Senator WAGNER. We are not giving them anything except to see that their rights as American citizens are protected. Your apprehension is not directed to the entire bill, it is only the features that attempt to enumerate the labor practices.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I think it is unnecessary to go into great detail at this time.

Senator WAGNER. How about the Labor Board as a permanent institution?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I think the Board should be given power at this time. I must say that I look with a little bit of misgiving on the creation of this formidable body as a permanent feature, with all due respect to you, Senator. You have done a good job, but it does look a little bit formidable. Of course I don't know how much water has run over the dam in the last 6 months.

Senator WAGNER. Don't you think it is advisable to have a forum to compose these differences, rather than have a strike as the only weapon?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Of course, Mr. Hillman has been very successful in setting up boards in one industry. You speak of the permanent board. I do not think the Government will get into this and get out of it again. I do not feel that we want to set up a formidable organization like the Interstate Commerce Commission at this time. I do not think we are quite ready to do it. I do not think we have thought the thing through quite far enough. The next session of Congress, I think, will be much better.

Now I realize that the situation you speak of is intolerable, where the Government says they shall elect officers, and they elect them, and they do serve. I realize that perfectly well. I do not think they should adopt something and then be powerless. That makes the Government ridiculous.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

The next witness is Mr. Ogburn.

STATEMENT OF CHARLTON OGBURN

Mr. OGBURN. My name is Charlton Ogburn, and my address is 120 Broadway, New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business or occupation?

Mr. OGBURN. I am a lawyer.

The CHAIRMAN. You are listed here as counsel of the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railways Employees of America, in New York City. Is that true?

Mr. OGBURN. Yes; I am the general counsel for the Amalgamated Association, which is one of the largest unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been general counsel?

Mr. OGBURN. Only since last summer and I have not represented any labor organization subsequently to last summer. Therefore, I feel that in presenting my views I am taking somewhat a more impartial view than might otherwise be the case.

The CHAIRMAN. You are presenting your views in your individual capacity, as a citizen?

Mr. OGBURN. Yes; and as counsel for the Amalgamated Association. I might say that my ideas are not related entirely to 1920, as Dr. Hotchkiss feared his were. I was an adviser of the N.R.A. last summer in one of its principal roles, and I have had a number of cases before the present National Labor Board, and I welcome the opportunity which I have of appearing in behalf of this bill.

During the few minutes in which I shall have the honor of addressing you, I want to stress what to my mind are the two salient features of the bill. I consider—I might say at the outset—that the provisions of this bill constitute the most desirable and needed legislation the Congress today could very well entertain. It meets the needs of labor. I go further and say it meets the needs of industry. It meets the needs of the good of the people as a whole. It is a milestone in American legislation. It is a cornerstone of industrial justice.

What Congress has done for the railroads and for railroad labor in the enactment of the Railway Labor Act and in setting up the United States Board of Mediation it ought also to do for industry generally and labor as a whole by passing this labor disputes act.

I envisage the National Labor Board created under this act as a great national labor court, a great national board of arbitration. For a number of years there has been an arm of the Government for the conciliation of disputes under the extremely capable and effective director of conciliation, Hon. Hugh L. Kerwin. The public knows little of the great achievements of this conciliation service. It should be continued where it is—in the Department of Labor.

But this National Labor Board is to my mind something else entirely. It is to be a great labor tribunal, a court of arbitration, with both labor and employer members and with impartial chairmen or public members of such high repute that both labor and industry will voluntarily consent that it arbitrate their differences, whether they be wages, working conditions, or disputes about self-organizations of workers.

The arbitration must be voluntary by the two sides; therefore this board could not be an appendage of the Department of Labor, because employers would have an apprehension—unjustifiably I agree—that the awards might be favorable to labor and not impartial. The board should be independent like the Interstate Commerce Commission, and like it should be quasi-judicial and administrative. Surely the proper settlements of labor disputes, peaceably and without strikes, the proper determination of wage levels ought to be as important a governmental function as fixing railroad rates or discovering unfair trade practices.

There are three precedents for such a national board as a Government body.

First was the National War Labor Board named by President Wilson, with a right to organize guaranty similar to 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, of whom the joint chairmen were ex-President Taft and Hon. Frank P. Walsh. If you will pardon a personal reference, I can make clearer to you my opportunity for observing the workings of a national labor board. I was in charge of the public-utility division of the National War Labor Board and in that capacity conducted more than 100 labor arbitrations on the electric railways of the United States, who with their employees voluntarily submitted their disputes to this Board. Subsequently I have acted individually in about 30 more arbitrations as impartial arbitrator on electric railway labor disputes. I have come to believe ardently in the principle of arbitration as a means of determining labor controversies. On railways, steam and electric, the strike is exceptionally costly. There would be more arbitration and fewer strikes, if the permanent board set up in this bill be created. The fact that such a board was avilable would mean a great deal. Several years ago I was selected as impartial arbitrator by the company and the men on a wage question on the Boston Elevated, but the Governor of Massachusetts declined to ratify my appointment on the ground that I was not a citizen or resident of Massachusetts. It then took 4 days for the trustees of the company and the employees to select another impartial chairman. During those 4 days the men were on strike and not a street car or a rapid-transit train moved in Boston or its environs. Had a national labor board been in existence, the controversy would have been immediately referred to it, without stoppage of service.

The Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees and Motor Coach Operators, for whom I am counsel, which is one of the large unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, has built its great success partly on its famous arbitration clause in its labor contracts, and its regard for the sanctity of those contracts. Mr. Mahon, its international president, one of the three greatest labor leaders ever produced in this country, is one of our forestmost apostles of labor arbitration.

The second precedent for such a national labor board is the United States Board of Mediation for the railroads, created by Congress.

The third precedent for such a board is the present National Labor Board, of which the author of this bill is the chairman, created and functioning under the Executive orders of the President, and performing an essential and highly important work under serious handicaps. It needs to be recreated under an act of Congress with power to enforce a labor code such as is provided for in this bill.

Such a national labor board under this labor disputes act would furthermore take the strain off the courts to a great extent in settling labor questions—and that strain if continued and accentuated may be none too good for our judicial system.

Congress last June passed a highly important law, signed by the President on June 16. It may become the most important act ever passed by an American Congress. It is the National Industrial Recovery Act. The N.R.A. created by it has proved highly beneficial to industry, especially to large manufacturers. But it will surely place burdens on labor in its role as consumer. It holds out one compensating advantage to labor—the famous section 7 (a). And if this proves a vain hope to labor, there is likely to be a catastrophe. Labor's rights to self-organization have been recognized by the courts since 1842. The right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing was inserted by President Wilson in the policy of the National War Labor Board. Congress put this right in the Railway Labor Act. And now this Congress has guaranteed it to labor generally by making it a part of all codes. The Supreme Court has upheld the Railway Labor Act and this right it guarantees to labor. Hundreds of workers, who read 7 (a) of the Recovery Act with joy and new hope, relied on its portection and went out to organize. I believe in every case which has been brought to my attention the workers themselves sought the American Federation of Labor rather than the American Federation of Labor seeking the workers. They soon found themselves discharged for these organization activities and are today walking the streets with nowhere to turn for help. Senator Wagner's bill is needed for these men of great faith who believed on their Government's promise.

The right of employees to self-organization as a means of equalizing the bargaining power of their employers should be complete and undisputed. An effective means of impairing and denying this right has been found by employers in the "company union", which they set up.

Now, I shall not discuss the company union, as I had intended to do, as a result of the long discussion by President Green this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. If you have any reference to it in the manuscript from which you are reading, it may be inserted in the record.

Mr. OGBURN. Thank you. I think it might be desirable to send for your record an excerpt from a rather full report made by the Russell Sage Institute in which the workings of company unions are discussed, and I think it would be very desirable to insert in your records a copy of an extremely excellent article by Senator Wagner which appeared in the New York Times on Sunday, the 11th. I would like to insert that article, if I may, if you have no objection.

The Chairman. Will you do so?

Mr. OGBURN. Thank you.

There is one phase of the company union that I would like to point out, and that is that I feel sure that before these hearings are over you are going to be told by some people that "there ain't no such animal." Economists—I have already heard more than one—say that they have searched the country in vain for the company dominated union. They have actually made that statement.

Now, these company unions are sometimes hard to recognize. They are cleverly disguised. They are like the puppet shows one sees in Italy, which so delight the children by their illusion. They go through all the motions, they swat one another over the head; but it is all done by an unseen person behind the screens who pulls the strings. It fools even some adults. These puppet shows and these company unions are very cleverly manipulated. One such company union before the National Labor Board on Tuesday of this week even fooled its own attorney who thought it was real.

The employees in these company unions have no real independence, no equal bargaining power. Participation by employers in such organizations, including financial participation, must cease. The companies usually match the men's payments and then manage the whole fund. I can supply this board in confidence with an accurate statement of one such company dominated union which lost millions of dollars belonging to its employees. And the subtlety of indirect management of company unions by employers has become a fine art.

Another result of the enactment of this bill will be greater prosperity and a more even distribution of wealth. There is no better means of raising wage levels than through collective bargaining of workers with equal bargaining power and directed by capable leaders. Higher wages mean greater purchasing power, greater markets, greater prosperity. Had unionization of workers continued its growth during the twenties with the result that more profits went into wages and less into plant extensions and speculation, the depression would have been greatly lessened.

May I address one sentence to the southern Senators, members of this honorable committee, and perhaps through them to the body of southern Senators who will have to pass on this bill if it is reported out. Southern labor is to a great extent unorganized. The N.R.A. is called on constantly to establish lower differentials on wages in the codes for the South. The South has a mistaken idea that low wages are best for it. If collective bargaining existed to a greater extent in the South, and consequently if wages were slowly raised to the national levels, it would mean more to the prosperity of the South than any other factor, except tariff adjustments. Suppose the pay rolls of South Carolina, as an instance, were increased through higher wage levels by $50,000,000 in a year, there would be that much more for the welfare and the education of its people.

This bill furthermore is a bulwark to our democracy. The A. F. of L. is the only active opponent, carrying on effective work against communism in this country. The way to keep labor conservative is to give it the right of self-organization and collective bargaining, and a just tribunal to hear its complaints. It is the few executives of industries here and there who still live in the dark ages who are causing the real bitterness among workers and who are the despair of the enlightened employers.

We therefore respectfully urge the retention of section 5, pages 5 and 6, of the bill in its entirety, and we urge the retention of section 303, reserving the right to strike.

I beg to differ with Mr. Hotchkiss, again, that delay in this matter is possible. We have no time to delay, and I think, Mr. Chairman, that you will have one of the most exceptional opportunities of your career in advocating in this committee such a bill as this.

Thank you very much, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We appreciate having your views.

Is there anyone else here who cannot be here tomorrow? Mr. Panken?

STATEMENT OF JACOB PANKEN

Mr. PANKEN. My name is Jacob Panken, of New York City.

Senator WAGNER. I think, Judge, you might put down a little bit of your background to show your opportunity to observe.

Mr. PANKEN. I have been connected with the trades union movement for about 35 or 36 years as counsel at one time to probably the major portion of the trades unionists in the city of New York.

I am personally the attorney for trades unions such as in the men's neckwear industry, in the baking industry, and in the taxicab situation. I had the pleasure of appearing before the distinguished Senator from New York in the silk situation which arose subsequent to the approval by the President of the United States of the Silk Textile Code, involving some 60,000 or 70,000 workmen who went on strike.

I represented these men and women, and, at the same time, I want to put it on record that I represent the Socialist Party in the discussion of this bill which is now before the Senate or before Congress and upon which this committee is now sitting.

There was one suggestion made by Professor Hale, which I think should be given a great deal of weight, and that is the change of phraseology in order to avoid the possibility of an interpretation which might endanger the very purpose of the bill.

Senator WAGNER. What is that?

Mr. PANKEN. It has already been inserted. Professor Hale and I got together and I think we found the proper language which would meet that situation.

To me, Mr. Chairman, the most menacing threat, not only to the workings out of the National Industrial Recovery Act but to the very freedom of people, is this manifestation of company unions. I have had some experience with company unions. They are an interference with the very elementary rights of American citizenship. I remember reading a decision handed down, I believe, sometime in the seventeenth century under the common law of Great Britain, and I think I quoted from that decision in an opinion that I wrote. In that opinion the court said——

The CHAIRMAN. I must leave, but Senator Walcott will preside and I will have a chance to read the record later.

Mr. PANKEN. I am very grateful to you for giving me the time today so I can leave.

In that opinion the highest court in England said, among other things, that the duress may be the result of compelling the entrance into a contract where there is no possibility of refusal to enter into the contract. You do not have to use force, you do not have to use coercion; if you are in a position by reason of control of circumstances to make it impossible for the other contracting party to refuse to enter into the contract, the courts would hold that to be duress.

If you want me to do so, I shall send you that decision. I am quite sure Senator Wagner is probably acquainted with it and the other lawyers on the committee.

The company unions are a result of an imposition upon the workmen. You have this situation: The employer does not have to tell the men, "You must join the company union." All he has to do is to tell the foreman or the superintendent or the personnel manager to tell the men it is good for them to be members of the brotherhood or the company union, under whatever name it may be organized, and immediately the people find themselves in the position, by virtue of the force of economic circumstances, where they must comply, not with a demand, but with a suggestion that it would be well for them to join the union.

I have one instance in mind, and I made a personal investigation. The superintendent or the personnel manager in that particular industry, as the people were receiving their pay, told them, "You sign this application to join the brotherhood and pay 10 cents." When somebody refused to do that, all that was told to that person was, "It would be a good thing for you to do that. If you do not do it it will not be so well for you."

As a matter of fact, in that particular industry there were people discharged because they refused to join this company union, and, as a result of it, the people have been on strike.

Let me suggest this to you: Company unions mean nothing more than what has been attempted to be established by edict in the dictatorship which is now functioning in the German Reich. By edict the employer becomes the leader and the workmen constitute a shop organization. The employer fixes the wages, the employer fixes the hours, and the only recourse that the workmen have against any determination on the part of the employer is by an appeal to what they call a "Court of Honor." Now, what that can possibly do for labor I do not know, but one thing this edict does, and that is to deprive labor in that particular country of any sign of independence. It has practically reduced labor to a situation of involuntary servitude, and where you have company unions imposed by the employers upon labor because of economic circumstances, because of the force of economic conditions, you are visiting upon labor, in my judgment, a species of involuntary servitude. It is because of that fact that I say that these company unions are not only a menace to labor from the economic angle, but they are a menace to labor from the point of view of American citizenship, the rights of freedom, and the rights of liberty.

It is because of that that we favor this measure, not so much because of what the National Labor Board can do in adjusting disputes, but as a measure protective of the rights of Americans to organize themselves and to give expression to their opinions without interference, intimidation, or coercion on the part of any individual because of his economic strength or the economic conditions.

Of course, we are interested also in the bill from the point of view of what it can do by way of avoiding prolonged strikes, by way of possibly avoiding strikes which are imminent. The National Labor Board can do that.

As it is presently constituted, you have a splendid body of men but you have a body of men who have no power to enforce their determinations, their decisions, and I want to call Senator Wagner's attention to the experience that I have had before the National Labor Board in the silk workers' situation.

The Senator has spent, not literally but figuratively, night after night. We got into session at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and sat through until 5 o'clock the next morning. We had the employers agree to certain minima and certain maximum hours, and after they agreed they simply laughed at their agreement, laughed at the decision, and I might say that their maneuvers were designed for the purpose of starving the silk workers back into the shops, because the National Labor Board had not the power to enforce that which was agreed to between the employers and the employees in the presence of the National Labor Board.

It seems to me that under this bill the National Labor Board will obtain the power to compel compliance with decisions handed down by it, after the submission of disputed questions to the Board for adjustment.

Now, then, there is another reason why we are in favor of this bill, and I personally urge its passage for that reason, and that is the question of increasing the purchasing power. The minima established under the codes, because of the right of the employers to organize trade associations and the promulgation of the codes of ethics—codes which would prevent unfair competition—result in the natural consequence of these codes in an increase in price levels. The increase in price levels or cost of living, came subsequent to the promulgation of the codes. The minima established under the codes, insofar as wages are concerned, unfortunately have thus far been so low that they are less than the requisite wages to make possible, not luxuries, but the necessities of life.

It may surprise some of you gentlemen to know that there are provisions in codes for as little as 20 cents an hour, or 21 cents an hour. Almost every code that I have—not almost but every code—that I have read, has a minimum wage scale of $12 per week.

Now, with a minimum established on a basis of $12 a week, with an increase in the price levels, labor cannot meet the increase in the price levels and hence there is no real increase in the purchasing power.

If there are coerced unions, company unions, there is no possibility of increasing the wage levels beyond the minimum and the minimum becomes the maximum wage.

The only protection that labor has, the only hope that labor has, to increase the wage levels to meet the increase of price levels is through free organization of labor.

There was some talk here about independent unions and the talk about the American Federation of Labor unions. Of course, I should like to see all of the trade unions of New York and in the United States under the banner of one organization, of the American Federation of Labor, but there is a sharp distinction between free trade unions and company unions, and what we stand for and what this bill is established for is to protect American labor in its right to organize freely, organize free trade unions.

This is a measure, in my judgment, which is imperative if the Industrial Recovery Act is to have any effect at all upon the prosperity or the recapture of the prosperity of the country.

Senator WALCOTT. Do you mind a question at that point?

Mr. PANKEN. I do not mind at all. I will be glad to answer it.

Senator WALCOTT. We hear occasionally here in Washington that the American Federation of Labor is trying at different points, notably Detroit, in the automobile business, to compel the local unions to come with the American Federation of Labor. Do you think there is any truth in that? Do you find it true anywhere?

Mr. PANKEN. I will say this, that all labor organizations try to bring all of the trade unions—local trade unions, into the fold of the industrial-trade-union movement because the philosophy of the trade-union movement is that if there is unity, if there is consolidation, if there is solidarity, there is a greater possiblity of advancing the interests of labor, and often a trades union will require of a local union to become affiliated with the international body. Whether the American Federation of Labor is doing it in Detroit now or not I am not sure, except that I will say that President Green this morning said quite definitely that what the American Federation of Labor desired is to conserve to American labor the right to free organization into trades unions regardless of whether they belonged to the American Federation of Labor or belonged to some other free trades union.

Senator WAGNER. Let me ask you something right there? You have had a good deal of experience with labor unions and members of labor organizations; is there any way of forcing a labor organization to do something against the will of the members of that organization?

Mr. PANKEN. I have never heard of a labor organization being forced to do something which its membership does not want to do except by force of economic conditions.

Senator WAGNER. I am not speaking of economic conditions.

Mr. PANKEN. You see, there is a strike and the workers will be out 6 months, and they do not want to go back to work, but because their children are starving they are compelled to go back and work and they do something they do not desire to do.

Senator WAGNER. What I meant was, you walk into a labor organization and say, "You have got to affiliate yourselves with a certain organization."

Mr. PANKEN. No; that is a matter which is presented by way of resolution and a vote taken and the majority decides as to what should be the action of the party.

Senator WALCOTT. You answered my question now, and I have just one more question on that point and then you may go on with your statement.

Do you agree with the last speaker in this statement, which, as I recall it, is this: That the American Federation of Labor is the greatest body in this country opposed to communism?

Mr. PANKEN. I did not say that the American Federation of Labor is the greatest body opposed to communism. I should say that the American Federation of Labor is one of the bodies that is opposed to communism and, of course, we would have to define what we understand by the term "communism."

Senator WALCOTT. I do not care to get into that.

Mr. PANKEN. I do say that the American Federation of Labor has fought quite strenuously communistic tendencies within the ranks of labor.

Senator WALCOTT. But do you admit that communism is in any sense synonymous with socialism?

Mr. PANKEN. No, I should not, because I am a socialist.

Senator WALCOTT. I understand that, but I wanted that to appear at this point. I do not care to go into it.

Mr. PANKEN. There is a great deal of difference between us in methods. Socialists do not believe in dictatorships, and because we do not believe in dictatorships we do not want company unions because company unions are an expression of the dictatorship of employers to the employees as to what they shall do. We want them to have freedom of the right to organize.

Senator WALCOTT. Then would you reason from that, perhaps, that the company unions are closer to a form of communism than no company unions?

Mr. PANKEN. I would not reason it that way. I would reason it this way, that the company unions are close to dictatorship, close to the method of organizing labor in countries where dictatorships rule. That is true of Italy, it is true of Germany, and I think it is now true of Austria. All the free labor organizations in Germany, Italy, and Austria, have been liquidated, and have been substituted by the forms that I have discussed with you.

If there are no other questions——

Senator WALCOTT. Proceed with your statement.

Mr. PANKEN. I think I have said all that I want to say.

Senator WALCOTT. Then this hearing is adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 4:15 p.m. the committee adjourned until 10 a.m. tomorrow.)

TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

FRIDAY, MARCH 16, 1934

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met at 10 a.m. pursuant to adjournment, Senator David I. Walsh presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Borah, Walcott, La Follette, and Davis.

Also present: Senator Robert F. Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Is Mr. Lewis here?

STATEMENT OF JOHN L. LEWIS, PRESIDENT UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Lewis, you are president of the United Mine Workers?

Mr. LEWIS. That is right, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Also a member of the National Labor Board?

Mr. LEWIS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And have been interested for years in the labor problems?

Mr. LEWIS. Quite so, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have your views on this matter.

Mr. LEWIS. I speak in endorsement of Senate bill 2926, introduced by Senator Wagner.

Mr. William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, has made a most comprehensive and illuminating statement of the entire subject which will enable me to be comparatively brief in my own remarks.

I concur entirely with Mr. Green's views as expressed by him. Unfortunately, I was not here at the conclusion of his address and did not hear the precise amendments which he suggested for the bill, and I will assume the liberty later, if the committee will let me, to make a suggestion or two of my own.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be welcomed.

Mr. LEWIS. The basic principles of this bill have been recognized by Congress in at least statutory enactment; namely, the Norris Act and the National Recovery Act.

This bill undertakes to put in precise form certain of these rights and privileges in a manner that will protect the purpose of the bill and prevent workers from being denied in their application the privileges accorded by the enactment of the measure.

In the main, the bill provides and specifically sets forth six unfair labor practices, and each of those practices are based upon principles already recognized by Congress in previous legislation. In my judgment those several defined labor practices are entirely meritorious.

The right of organization and collective bargaining is now understood by all industrial workers, but the continual denial of that right and its evasions by company unions is creating unrest and will breed revolt among the workers in industry, apart from any question of wages. This is especially true in view of the fact that the Government through legislation is encouraging organization of industry.

The National Industrial Recovery Act encourages the organization of trade associations, groups of employers, and employers' associations of all character. Employers and industries are the beneficiaries of that act; they are thus enabled to do under the National Recovery Act what they were formerly not able to do in the formation of these associations, and in the definition of trade practices and the formation of selling pools and agencies, because of the provisions of the antitrust laws with which formerly they would have come in more or less conflict.

If the Government is to encourage organization upon the part of employers who primarily are more able to protect themselves than are the workers, then it does seem to be entirely logical for the Government at least to give the workers the necessary degree of protection in the formation of their own voluntary forms of trade unions.

The bill introduced by Senator Wagner does not presume to make the Government a party to the formation of unions of the workers but it does undertake to protect the workers in the formation of such unions if they elect to take that action.

The Industrial Recovery Act has been taken by the employers and by the leaders in industry to mean that they are free to take advantage of all of its provisions in favor of industry and finance and also free to deny to the workers any privileges that they may esteem to be due them by the enactment of that legislation by Congress.

In the policy of forming company unions the employers undertake to deprive labor of the rights to be represented in any broad or any national way by representatives whom they may elect to employ. The constitution of the average company union provides that the workers are not free to elect representatives except those employed in the plant of such company. The workers are deprived of the opportunity of availing themselves of skilled counsel in the form of economists, representatives of national labor organizations, attorneys, or any other agents if they are not employed in the plant. The employers attempt to localize the growth, formation and administration of so-called "labor unions" in this precise fashion while, at the same time, reserving the right and the privilege in their own forms of organization to hire the best talent available in our country for the presentation of their viewpoint to the public press, in wage negotiations, or in any of the councils of the Nation.

Senator WAGNER. And does not industry, too, organize upon a national scale?

Mr. LEWIS. Industries do organize on a national scale, Senator, and the Industrial Recovery Act encourages such organization on such scale.

The CHAIRMAN. And gives them rights that they did not heretofore enjoy?

Mr. LEWIS. That is right, Senator; it gives them rights that they did not heretofore enjoy, and, in fact, gives them rights which were specifically prohibited prior to the enactment of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly. These suspended rights were partly on condition that they would extend to labor the rights which are enumerated in section 7 (a)?

Mr. LEWIS. Labor so understands, Senator, and labor is deeply grieved because of the bad faith evidenced in the attitude of the major industries of the country.

At the present time the National Association of Manufacturers, the Iron and Steel Institute, and other associations representative of employers of industry are giving out statements in opposition to the enactment of the Wagner Bill. This is to be expected. The National Association of Manufacturers appeared before Senate committees in opposition to the enactment of the Industrial Recovery Act. It is but natural that the National Association of Manufacturers should now oppose the Wagner Bill which seeks merely to define unfair labor practice in industry, and to protect the workers against the imposition of such unfair labor practices.

The iron and steel industry opposed the enactment of the National Recovery Act. I recall that Mr. Lamont, at that time president of the Iron and Steel Institute, formerly Secretary of Commerce of the United States, appeared before a Senate committee and vigorously attacked section 7 (a) of the Industrial Recovery Act. Since that time the iron and steel industry has been one of the greatest beneficiaries of American industry of the effects of the Recovery Act. The code of fair competition in the iron and steel industry is esteemed to be one of the best codes that have been promulgated or approved by the President. It amounts almost to an iron-clad contract between producers of iron and steel products in this country, and it gives to the iron and steel industry an absolute and positive closed shop in industry as regulating the practices, acts, and commercial dealings of those who manufacture iron and steel products.

The iron and steel industry fulminates in the public press in favor of the so-called "open shop" and in favor of company unions, organized, maintained, administered, and financed by the industry, while at the same time the iron and steel industry within itself imposes the closed shop upon iron and steel manufacturers.

The iron and steel industry has profited tremendously from the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act and from the beneficent provisions of the iron and steel code. May I point out that in 1932 the United States Steel Corporation reported a loss in operations approximating some $91,000,000 or $92,000,000, a terrifying financial statement. Under the ratio of loss taking place in 1932 it was merely a question of time, which could easily be computed on a mathematical basis, when United States Steel Corporation would have been compelled to go out of business, because its cash resources were being depleted so fast and no credit being available, the corporation was facing dissolution at a comparatively early date.

The report of the steel corporation for operations in the year 1933, only recently released, shows that its losses were cut to but about $41,000,000 or $42,000,000 this year, still substantial losses, but still a substantial improvement in operating income and earnings for the company in 1933 as against 1932, and without question that was due almost entirely to the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act and the operation of the new deal under President Roosevelt's administration.

And yet the United States Steel Corporation, after having profited from this legislation to the extent of $42,000,000 in a year, with exceedingly fair prospects for the current year, has the brazen effrontery to join with the Iron and Steel Institute in denouncing the labor sections of the Industrial Recovery Act and in calling upon the public to impose the enactment by Congress of the Wagner bill now passing before your honorable committee, a ghastly picture, destructive of confidence and good faith, and indicative of the hypocrisy in modern American business.

The steel corporation, like the automobile industry, and like others, is willing to take unto itself all of the advantages that may come from legislative enactments by an intelligent Congress, but, like the dog in the manger, they ask this privilege be held from the working people in America who make possible the operation of industry and the maintenance of our democratic institutions of Government.

The iron and steel industry from time to time fulminates about its desire to maintain and protect and perpetuate the sacred principle of the open shop in that industry. Time after time it makes these pronouncements in public places and the public press. The term "open shop" implies that the shop is open to the workers to join any form of organization that they may desire or elect, and yet the contrary is true, and the steel industry within the lifetimes of most of us has never been open to the workers to join a union except that form of union foisted upon the workers through so-called "plans of employee" representation in the various units of the steel industry.

In proof sufficient of this statement I point out that in all of the plants of the Carnegie Steel Co., a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation, there are no legitimate union men. In the plants of the American Bridge Co., a subsidiary of the Steel Corporation, there are no members of legitimate unions. The same is true of the National Tube Co. The same is true in all of the subsidiary plants of that company with the exception of their coal properties, and there are union men in the coal properties of the United States Steel Corporation because the United States Steel Corporation, with all of its power and influence, has not been able to prevent it, and that is the only reason.

In their steel plants they have an espionage system that reports and rapidly weeds out any man who joins a union or who talks as if he wanted to join a union or who attends a meeting of a labor organization or who is seen conferring with representatives of organized labor, and the only union to which he can belong is the so-called "union" promoted by the steel corporations and set forth in their plans of employee representation.

I do not know why a corporation thinks it has the right to organize, administer, regulate, operate, conduct, and finance a labor union of its employees. From the sheer standpoint of ethics I do not know why the United States Steel Corporation or the automobile industry, or any other industry would say to itself, "We will prevent our workers from having the kind of an organization which they desire to represent them, and we will prevent them from employing the kind of agents,the type of agents that they desire to represent them, and we will so arrange it that they can only have the kind of an organization that we wish to give them and they can only employ the type and character of an individual to represent them which is pleasing to us."

There is not even an element of sportmanship in that sort of a policy. Our British cousins would say that it is not even cricket.

Under the leadership of these great corporations like the Steel Corporation, the automobile industry, and others, the National Industrial Conference Board has been sending out in recent months propaganda encouraging employers to foist upon the employees in their plants modern company unions, company unions with all of the modern appurtenances of 1933 or 1934, company unions that will operate to the advantage of the company and the disadvantage of the workers, company unions that will neutralize the efforts of workers to improve their conditions, company unions that will not be unions in fact, but mere makeshifts and hollow mockeries deceptive in themselves and intended to divert the energies of the workers from their own self-protection to the protection of the corporation which employs them.

In my judgment this recent offensive of industry to gain control of American labor through the imposition of company unions is only akin to the efforts of gangsters in some of our larger cities to "muscle in" on labor unions and get control of those labor unions for their ownselfish benefits. I think that after the Wagner bill has passed Congress and it has been signed by the President that those veterans of the National Industrial Conference Board, the automobile industry, the steel industry, and other industries, ought to get together and form an association and call themselves "the muscle men of 1933". It would be an appropriate name because that is what they are trying to do.

I wish the Senators could have sat in on the hearings held this week in Washington before the National Labor Board on the conditions in the automobile industry. It was developed there from evidence that in the automobile industry in Detroit and other cities since the enactment of the Recovery Act, to which, in August and September of 1933, the automobile industry did by coercion and by intimidation form company unions; that the automobile industry did discriminate against numerous individuals and discharge them and deprive them of their employment, some of them after many years of service, for joining other unions than company unions and for talking of joining other unions than the company unions; that it did discharge certain of the elected representatives by company unions, elected in their shop unions, after those men found through experience that the company unions were but hollow mockeries and did join other unions; that the automobile industry, since the organization of the company unions, did deny the rights of collective bargaining to workers who had organized themselves into other groups and other unions by refusing to meet them in conference except under such conditions, such stipulations that they found they could not accede to, for instance, turning over the list of their membership to the company without any guaranty that their members would not be discriminated against or discharged.

What was the formula for organizing the company unions in one of the plants of the General Motors? On a certain day the foreman of the shop, or a shop foreman, would go to the men of strong character in his shop, men of personality, with some elements of leadership, and tell them they were called at a meeting in the office that afternoon. The meeting would assemble that afternoon in the company office and they would be addressed by a representative of the company, they would be told that the company wanted to form a company union, that the company expected these people to help them, that these men would be paid their regular hourly rates for such help by the company. They were then given copies of the constitution and bylaws of such company union, they were told that an election would be held, that the company would fix the date of an election, that the company would supervise the election, that the election would be held in the plant, that ballot boxes would be provided, that the watchers would be designated, and they were asked to help, and they were asked under such conditions and under such circumstances that they testified that their refusal to participate or their refusal to help would in their judgment have jeopardized their standing with the company, and their jobs.

The arrangements were thus made, the notices of the election were posted, each individual in the shop was canvassed by his foreman or his subforeman, and each of them was told that the foreman desired to have a 100 percent record in his shop and he insisted that he go and vote and that the act of voting in the company-held election would make them members in good standing of this newly formed company union. They had no investment in it, they had no duty in the matter to perform except the dropping of a ballot in the box under the eye of the foreman or shop representative, and that made them members in good standing of this form of company union.

Witnesses testified that they resisted voting, that they were opposed to such participation, that they explained to the foreman they did not believe in that form of union, but they were asked to vote anyhow, and, against their will, they voted, and the returns were published that so many thousand men in this shop and this plant participated in the election and that they elected such representatives as were designated. The company fixed the requirements of representatives to be elected. It designated how many should be elected, or regulated the election and threw all manner of restrictions around it, and, in addition to that, the company financed it. They paid for the printing, they paid for the time of those key men in forming this organization, and it was testified that they pay the regular hourly rates to all of the representatives of this union in carrying out the business of the union and in taking up the grievances of individuals that arise in the ordinary course of its operation.

In other words, the company unions in the automobile industry are merely subsidiary organizations to the General Motors and other corporations engaged in that industry. They are subsidiary organizations just as much as a subsidiary sales company in another city. They are subsidiary organizations just as much as a captive coal company operating a captive mine for the Wheeling Steel Co. is to that company, and yet they seek to impose upon the workers this form of economic repression and they seek to chide those who would undertake to change that condition in this modern year of 1934.

In a public advertisement on Wednesday, March 14, published in the Washington Star, the automobile industry, through the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, with a list of its members attached, says as follows:

1. Under the law and the code the industry believes it owes a duty to its employees, not only not to coerce them in self-organization for the purposes of bargaining, but so far as it legitimately can to protect them against coercion from any source in to selecting representatives not of their own free choice.

That statement has been disproven by evidence adduced in the hearing of the National Labor Board on the same date as the publication of this advertisement. The evidence shows that, far from not coercing employees, the industry was coercing employees and did coerce them.

Their statement no. 2 is:

No employee shall be discriminated against because of his choice of representatives.

The evidence adduced before the Board showed discrimination after discrimination against individual after individual because he had exercised that freedom of choice, because he had elected to join a local union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, or because he had become an officer of the union or a shop steward or a deputy shop steward, and individual after individual testified he was then discriminated against, discharged, and victimized, and the evidence remains unrefuted upon the records of the National Labor Board.

The third statement is:

3. The accredited representatives of any group of employees shall be free to bargain collectively in regard to matters of common interest.

The record of evidence after hearing of the National Labor Board is that groups of employees in practically all of the plants addressed communications to the company asking for joint conferences with the representatives of the union to which he belonged, and not in one instance was such conference granted. The employers in each instance set up conditions which the employees were not able to meet with any degree of security.

So, the automobile industry stands indicated before the National Labor Board, and the automobile industry under that evidence and before that Board stands indicated of misrepresenting the facts to the American people through the publication of advertisements of this kind on the 14th day of March 1934.

I do not know why the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, with such members as Chrysler, General Motors, Pierce Arrow, Hudson, and others, should undertake to deceive the American people about the facts of this thing. Why publish in the daily papers things that are untrue and charge up the cost of such publication to the cost of producing an automobile and make the American people pay for the dissemination of false propaganda, because this propaganda is false, and I refer to the Senators the record of the National Labor Board in proof sufficient of that statement.

Senator WAGNER. May I ask a question here, sir?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. Do you recall the testimony given by the so-called "representatives" of the workers elected at this election you described, as stating that they never had attempted to make collective bargaining agreements on behalf of the workers with the industry?

Mr. LEWIS. That is right, Senator. It was brought out in the hearing that these companies in the automobile industry, far from being organizations formed for collective bargaining, were rather organizations formed for the purpose of preventing collective bargaining because, in fact, there has been no attempt made to negotiate wage agreements or conditions of employment with the automobile companies, and, in fact, no such agreements had been negotiated and no such agreements are in effect in the automobile industry.

Senator WAGNER. May I ask another question here for the purpose of correcting apparently a misconception as to what the issue is in this particular case? I ask that because of some editorials that I have read this morning which apparently show that the editorial writer had no conception of what the issue was.

The automobile industry refused to negotiate with some representatives who called to represent the workers and also officers of an outside union upon the ground that they did not represent the workers? Is it not a fact that in answer to that the workers of that whole industry as represented before our Board asked simply this, this simple act of justice, as I see it—let us have an election, supervised by a Government agency, where every worker shall have a free choice to vote as he pleases and decide that question?

Mr. LEWIS. Senator, that is precisely correct.

Senator WAGNER. Is that not the only issue?

Mr. LEWIS. That is the only issue.

Senator WAGNER. I am asking that because in one of the editorials that I read, and it gets to be a little annoying sometimes, the misunderstandings, the suggestion was that the Government was attempting to impose some particular union upon the automobile industry when all that has been asked is that we hold an election like we do in our political affairs so that the workers themselves may determine whom they want to represent them?

Mr. LEWIS. That is entirely correct, Senator, and the evidence was that the workers there have indicated time after time that they would be willing to accede to the supervision of the National Labor Board to determine their rights to represent the employees through an election or otherwise.

The whole question of company unions and the attitude of these corporations toward legitimate organizations of labor is not based upon any principle. There is no dedication to a high purpose, there is no spirit of a crusade involved. The industrialists of America who espouse the cause of the company union do not possess any of the blood of the martyrs because it is merely a question of expediency, it is just a question of how much they can put across and how much they can get away with in their immediate and specific instance.

For instance, the representatives of the steel industry, and I pay particular attention to the steel industry this morning because of the statement of the Iron and Steel Institute published in yesterday's press releases—the statement of the United States Steel Corporation from time to time is that they do not deal with labor unions as such.

They said that during the strike of the men in the captive mines last year and they have said it time after time since that date, and yet in all of the time that that phrase was being mouthed by representatives of that corporation, the United States Steel Corporation was dealing with the United Mine Workers of America, and had been dealing with the United Mine Workers of America for nearly a quarter of a century in its Illinois and Indiana properties. In other words, even that corporation dealt with the United Mine Workers and with a labor union as such when it was expedient to do it, and they refrained from dealing with legitimate organizations of labor as such in their steel plants when it was expedient to do it. There is nothing involved in the question except the element of expediency.

It is a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde policy. It is the policy of not letting your right hand know what you left hand doeth, if that is expedient for them to do.

We have another illuminating example of that. Mr. Ernest Weir, of the Weirton Steel Co., for some time past, has been giving an exhibition of opposition to the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act. He has defied the National Labor Board and has spurned the good offices of the President of the United States in order to settle this matter. In fact, he is conducting himself with the cold ferocity of a 5-year old defying his mother when he sets himself up as saying that a grave question of principle is involved, that he will not accede to the right of the National Labor Board, that he will not grant an election in his steel plants, and that he will not do this and will not do that, and yet even the ferocious Ernest Weir, of the Weirton Steel Co., on March 6, 1934, through his subsidiary, the Weirton Coal Co., operating the Isabella Mine near Brownsville, Pa., started a contract with the United Mine Workers of America for that mine and is working under that contract at this time. Near Brownsville, Pa., he deals with the United Mine Workers of America on his coal property; at Weirton, W.Va., a few miles away, in his steel plant, he holds up his hand in holy horror and refuses to deal with the Iron and Steel Workers Union and refuses to accede to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Board and spurns the efforts of the President in trying to make an adjustment of the matter.

Senator BORAH. I came in a little later, Mr. Lewis. Who are you speaking of?

Mr. LEWIS. Ernest T. Weir, president of the Weirton Steel Co. I am pointing out the hypocrisies of certain industrialists in dealing with this labor question, Senator, in saying that there is a principle involved when, as a matter of fact, there is no question involved except one of cooperation and expediency.

I am pointing out that the United States Steel Corporation, which for years has been one of the exponents of the so-called "open shop" in American industry, while maintaining that so-called "policy" in its steel mills, has been dealing during all of these years with the United Mine Workers, as such, in certain of its coal mines; and the United States Steel Corporation last year, in 1933, was refusing to deal with the United Mine Workers of America as such in its captive mines in Pennsylvania while dealing with the United Mine Workers in its captive mines in Illinois; and I am pointing out, sir, that under those circumstances there cannot be any principle involved but merely the requirements of corporation expediency.

I think that it is unfair to the American people for industrialists and the captains of industry in this country to be guilty of such deception and hypocrisies in their labor relations. I think it is destructive of confidence on the part of the workers. I think it is provocative of unrest. I think it helps to crystalize discontent.

I think it has much to do with the alarming condition which prevails in the automobile industry as we sit in this meeting because it strikes down confidence, and if the workers can have no confidence in the managers of industry, and if the managers of industry are successful in circumventing the tribunal set up by the Government for the maintenance of stable relationships, then one can expect that the workers will come to believe that they have no recourse or no protection except perhaps through their own efforts, and for that reason hundreds of thousands of workers in the automobile industry, as I speak these words, are considering the exercise of their economic strength and the application of their collective energy.

Senator BORAH. What is the real issue in this automobile strike?

Mr. LEWIS. The real issue in the automobile strike, Senator, is that, contrary to the provisions of the—I speak from the evidence adduced before the National Labor Board in this city this week—contrary to the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act the automobile industry did by coercion and intimidation form company unions in those plants; that they are maintaining, conducting, and financing those company unions at this time; they are paying the expenses of such company unions; they pay the officers of such unions; they paid the organizers of such unions, and they are even paying the witnesses, some 38 in number, that have been in the city this week, that they brought down here to testify on behalf of the company union before the National Labor Board—that is the testimony before the board; that the companies did, contrary to the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, discriminate against their employees for joining other organizations; they did discharge them; they did deprive them of their employment; they did continue to refuse to reemploy them, and the workers think that they are even conducting a blacklist although that point was not definitely proven, so far as my own opinion was concerned, in the evidence of the board.

Further, that contrary to the provisions of the Industrial Recovery Act, in violation thereof, the companies are refusing to bargain collectively with groups of their employees organized into unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor; that such unions representing such employees from time to time through correspondence communicated with the company and asked for joint committees to bargain collectively, that in each instance the companies have declined to bargain collectively with the representatives of those unions, and those employees except under conditions which they set up, which the workers feel that they cannot meet, namely, the furnishing to the company of a list of the members of that particular union which would expose those members to discharge and victimization, in their opinion.

Senator BORAH. What proportion of the men working in the automobile industry are opposed to the company union?

Mr. LEWIS. As a whole, I do not know. With respect to the plants under consideration by the Board, which were certain of the General Motors plants, and the Hudson Co., and the Fisher Body, before the National Labor Board the evidence was that as a general rule in the plants the American Federation of Labor unions had more than a majority of the total number of employees. Now, those American Federation of Labor local unions contained a vast number of men who ostensibly were members of the company union because because they became members of the company union in August and September when the company required them to march up past a ballot box in the shop and drop a ballot in the box and that has made them a member in good standing of the company union..

Senator BORAH. That is——

Senator WAGNER. I think there is one step further that the Senator would be interested in; that in view of that controversy all the workers have asked of our Board was to have an election, supervised by some Government agency, so that the men would have free choice to determine that question of representation.

Mr. LEWIS. That is right, Senator.

Senator BORAH. Would this law remedy the proposition of the automobile companies refusing to recognize the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. LEWIS. That is not involved, Senator.

Senator BORAH. I know, but you say that is one of the points.

Mr LEWIS. No; not the recognition of the American Federation of Labor, but the bargaining, to meet in joint conference to bargain with those groups of employees who have joined local unions which are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The question of recognizing that union as the American Federation of Labor is not involved.

Senator WAGNER. It might be any other union or any other independent group. That is not the question.

The CHAIRMAN. It would compel them to recognize the representatives of the employees in that particular industry chosen by themselves.

Senator WAGNER. After they have been elected, exactly, and that is all the issue is in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. What I have been wondering about, and perhaps Senator Wagner can answer the inquiry, or you, Mr. Lewis, both being members of the Labor Board—in the National Recovery Act we had a good deal of discussion about the issuing of licenses and it was assumed that if that power was given the administration of the act it could enforce the provisions of the act. Why has not that power of issuing and taking away licenses been exercised in connection with the troubles you have had in getting action under section 7 (a)?

Mr. LEWIS. Senator, I am unable to give you an intelligent answer to your question. Like yourself, I think that as a matter of policy the licensing of corporations in certain instances should have been followed. To my knowledge it has not been done. There may be certain legal questions which involve the Department of Justice or other branches of the Government, with which I am not familiar. I have no other knowledge as to why that has not been done and I deeply regret that it has not been done, because I believe that the licensing feature of the Recovery Act is one of its very important elements.

The CHAIRMAN. It was included in the law for the purpose of giving the Administrator the authority to enforce the rules and regulations.

Mr. LEWIS. I so understood at the time.

Senator BORAH. Perhaps it would raise some legal questions which have not been settled yet.

Mr. LEWIS. Perhaps so.

Senator WAGNER. That right, by the way, expires in June of this year.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Continuing——

Senator BORAH. Before you go ahead, Mr. Lewis, what you people are contending for is freedom of these workingmen to do as they please about the union?

Mr. LEWIS. Senator, we think the workers have a right to form the kind of a labor organization that they desire and that the corporation which employs them has no right to dictate that form of organization and no right to subsidize that organization and no right to administer its functions.

Senator BORAH. You would concede that the working men had the right to a choice of the union?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, certainly, Senator, certainly.

Senator BORAH. Without pressure from anybody, either from other union organizations or the corporation?

Mr. LEWIS. Precisely so, sir. We fully agree with the principle. In other words, if the workers want to form a union not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor they certainly have that right and, as a matter of fact, there are a number of very fine legitimate unions in this country that are not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The four railroad brotherhoods are not affiliated and yet they are recognized as the standard type of labor organizations in this country. The Amalgamated Garment Workers Union for 20 years was not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, but within the last year have become affiliated with the American Federation of Labor by voluntary initiative on their own part and their own motion. They sought affiliation with it. There are other unions throughout the country, less in consequence, legitimate in themselves, that for reasons of their own have not seen fit to affiliate with the national movement.

The American Federation of Labor is merely a federation of labor unions and undertakes to act as the spokesman for those organizations, at the same time giving to the subordinate organizations the most full autonomy in the conduct of their affairs.

The Federation of Labor does not undertake to say to any of its affiliated unions that it shall do this or shall do that with respect to their own internal affairs or their relationships with their own industry or employees, and we certainly agree with you, sir, that the right indutiably exists for these workers to select their own form of organization.

That is what we are asking in this bill, and the bill sets up certain—the heart of the bill, as I understand it, Senator, is contained in the six unfair labor provisions set forth in the act, and the bill would forbid a powerful employer from calling his workers on company time into a shop meeting and saying, "Do this, do that, or do the other thing under our supervision as the form of union you shall have."

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Lewis, do you know a single instance where a company union has ever negotiated a collective bargaining agreement with its employers?

Mr. LEWIS. I only know of instances where they imply some form of agreement. I do not know of any instance where there has been a negotiation and agreement or the formal execution of such an agreement.

Senator WAGNER. The reason I asked you is because you will remember we inquired of representatives that were selected under the representation plan of the company unions in the automobile industry if they ever attempted to negotiate collective bargaining agreements providing for wages and hours with their employers and they said they never had.

Mr. LEWIS. His answer was in the negative, and, undoubtedly, in the automobile industry by that testimony there are no such agreements and there have been no attempts to negotiate such agreements, and apparently the automobile manufacturers do not intend to permit their men to undertake to negotiate collective bargaining agreements.

As a matter of fact, if you get right down to it, why should a corporation permit its own privately owned union to do anything distasteful to the corporation? They pay the fiddler and undoubtedly they think they have the right to call the tune. They own it and they ought to regulate it if they have the right to own it, but it is the right to own it that we challenge now.

Labor does not undertake to regulate the internal affairs of a corporation. All the labor unions of this country give to the corporations the right to regulate their own affairs. Then why should not a corporation yield to labor the right to regulate its affairs?

Senator BORAH. Do the unions ever undertake to say to a corporation whom they shall employ?

Mr. LEWIS. Whom it shall employ?

Senator BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no knowledge of such a policy.

Senator BORAH. What I mean is, do the different labor organizations ever undertake to impose upon the corporations their union?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, they ask for the recognition of their unions, yes. They ask for everything.

Senator BORAH. Of course they ask to be recognized, but do they ever undertake by strikes or otherwise to force the corporation to employ——

The CHAIRMAN. A member of the union?

Senator BORAH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They sometimes require, do they not, a member of the union to be employed in some trade unions?

Mr. LEWIS. I have no doubt that certain contracts provide for employment of none but members of the union, the so-called "closed-shop" contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. It is particularly true in the building trades, is it not?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not have specific knowledge of the building trades but I do know that such contracts are in existence. May I say, however, that in the mining industry we do not press that point. In large areas of the mining industry every miner belongs to the United Mine Workers but we do not press that consideration as a matter of contract. We think that the average man who works for a living would like to join a union and have the services of that union to protect him in his daily employment and represent him, unless he has some reason not to accept the services of the union, some interests, some reason, some motive, some purpose, some solicitation, some profit.

We find that the average man who refuses to join a union has some personal motive. It may be because his brother-in-law is a foreman and his brother-in-law asked him not to join a union and that is why he refrains from joining; it may be that he has a promise of preferment if he does not join a union; it may be any question of personal equation or personal ambition or personal relationship that keeps him from wanting to join the union. But, we find from experience in the mining industry, and I speak specifically of that because I am more familiar with it, that the average man likes to have the union protect him and represent him and he wants to be a member of the union. In exemplification of that fact, sir, may I point out that in 1933 in less than 6 weeks time in the mining industry after the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act that 360,000 mine workers joined the United Mine Workers of America, an act which hitherto they had not been able to do because they were restricted from doing it by the conditions of their employment and the conduct of their employers by court injunctions, by armed guards, by living on private property, and a host of other conditions.

Before that time we told committees of the Congress that if you would pass legislation that would give these men freedom of action they would of themselves join the union. They join an organization because they know enough to know that the union is a beneficent influence for a man who works with his hands because it can protect him better than he can protect himself as an individual, and it does not need the impassioned pleadings of a fervent orator to convince the modern American workman that it is to his advantage to join a union; he will join a union and avail himself of its influence and its privileges if you give him conditions that will enable him to do it.

The same is true in the iron and steel industry. There is no particular organization right now in the iron and steel industry. Why? Well, because the steel companies imposed a plan of company union on the men, because they prohibit them from joining other unions, and because the men are not free; they maintain an espionage system, they discharge them if they join the union or if they look like they are going to join the union, and there is no organization there. But give the workers in the iron and steel industry freedom from certain ghastly company unions that are imposed upon them and they will join to a man the legitimate unions of this country. They are trying to protect themselves through the modern practice of collective bargaining and increase their wages and improve their working conditions.

Now, the United Mine Workers, which is one of the standard organizations of the country, of course, does not have to go out and ask for anything that will compel men to join the organization. We do not want that. All we ask is freedom of opportunity for the individual and we know he will join the United Mine Workers and we know he will pay his dues, and that is demonstrated by the fact that now, as I sit here, we have between 600,000 and 700,000 of the United Mine Workers of America in the bituminous and anthracite coal industry, practically all there is. We have a few little localities where we have a company union or two that are holding out, or something of that sort, but they are in themselves relatively insignificant and the matter is rapidly being adjusted.

Just the day before yesterday in one of the last strongholds of the Bourbon coal operators of this country, in the State of Alabama, 85 percent of the commercial coal operators of that State signed a contract with the United Mine Workers of America, and a convention is today meeting in Birmingham to pass upon and ratify that agreement with the United Mine Workers of America.

Not in the lifetime of any of us has there been any collective bargaining agreements in the coal industry in Alabama. There has been strike after strike all through the years and each time the workers undertook to organize they were discharged, and after they were starving they were finally allowed to go back to their underground working places. But now it has come even in Alabama, even in Alabama. Alabama is about to join the Union, about to become a part of the United States in that industrial sense, and it is due to the fact that the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act created the opportunity for the workers of that State to exercise their economic influence.

Now, we are asking the Congress of the United States to pass the Wagner bill which does not contain any new principle, does not contain any principles not already recognized by Congress, because it has been recognized in the Norris Act and in the National Industrial Recovery Act, but it sets forth here these unfair labor practices, so that it will be impossible for the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. in Alabama to continue to operate, finance, maintain, administer, and enforce a company union in the coal mines of that State.

I think that there is intense interest in this measure in the minds of all the workers of this country. I think the overwhelming sentiment of the millions of American workmen, American workers, whether men or women, is behind this measure. I think there is no one against it except the corporations who have selfish motives to serve.

The American workmen think the corporations are unfair in their attitude. They think it is a selfish attitude, they think they are trying to maintain rather a medieval relationship with their employees in industry, and they think they are trying to maintain it for pure questions of corporation expediency, and the corporations like the Steel Corporation which profited last year to the extent of $42,000,000 at the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, should certainly have no right in fact or in morals to join the Iron and Steel Institute yesterday in denouncing the Wagner bill.

Senator BORAH. How did the corporation experience a gain of $42,000,000 by reason of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. LEWIS. You were not here when I was discussing that matter a few minutes ago.

Senator BORAH. You need not go over it again.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I will briefly. In 1932 the United States Steel Corporation operated at a loss of about $92,000,000, which is some loss—12 months, $8,000,000 a month, more or less—some loss. The United States Steel Corporation could mathematically compute the life of the corporation at that ratio of loss. Its operating cash was being diminished at such a rate that it was merely a question of time until the United States Steel Corporation would face dissolution because under the banking conditions that prevailed at that time it could not borrow any money, and at that time the United States Government was not financing any corporations, and the complete, stark disaster faced America's premier corporation.

Well, with the coming of 1933 and the arrival, sir, of the "new deal", the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the promulgation of a code of fair competition for the steel industry, which, in itself, is one of the most complete documents in American industry, the United States Steel Corporation began to do better, substantially better.

Senator BORAH. By fixing its own prices?

Mr. LEWIS. Through whatever advantage accrued to the industry through the code, and its losses were reduced to about $41,000,000 or $42,000,000 in 1933, a shrinkage in loss of $40,000,000 to $42,000,000. I will not attempt to quote the exact millions, but it was right in there.

Well, it is facing now what is admittedly better prospects in 1934 than was the case in 1933, and 1933 was $40,000,000 and odd better than 1932. That is certainly a substantial amount of advantage to derive from the code of fair competition in the iron and steel industry.

Senator BORAH. Are you speaking of the code of fair competition? The United States Steel Corporation has plants on the Pacific coast and when it sells its products from the plants on the Pacific coast it makes the buyer of the product pay the freight from Pittsburgh?

Mr. LEWIS. I so understand.

Senator BORAH. Do you call that fair competition?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not know, but evidently they have the right to do it under the code which obtains in that industry, and, of course, they were doing it for many years in advance of the enactment of the Industrial Recovery Act or in advance of the approval of the code of fair competion in the industry. It is merely a practice that has existed for many years which has not been eliminated and which cannot, sir, rightly be charged up to the Industrial Recovery Act.

Senator BORAH. It can be charged up to the Industrial Recovery Act if the Industrial Recovery Act does not stop it.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, sir, I think it is merely one of the things that has not yet been stopped or has not been corrected. There are many of them, sir, I have no doubt, and one of them, and more important to me, is this terrible practice of imposing company unions on their employees and prohibiting the exercise of normal individual personal rights in the steel industry by the employees of that industry, and the Wagner bill will free those people.

Senator BORAH. If the steel industry can fix prices and if the steel industry can maintain the Pittsburgh-plus prices, they can make the consumers of this country pay whatever they see fit to charge so long as the traffic will bear it.

Mr. LEWIS. They have been doing that ever since they have been organized. Never at any time since the organization of the United States Steel Corporation, and the throwing together of all those great plants, which were trusts in themselves before the organization of the holding company, never at any time has the United States Steel Corporation failed to do just that thing you have just uttered. It has been testified here before committees of Congress in investigations of the steel industry throughout the years that the Steel Corporation could make steel anywhere up to $5 a ton cheaper than the independents, but they refrained from selling at cheaper than the independents because of their benevolent policy, they did not want to put the independents out of business, and they took $5 a ton extra profit for not putting them out of business, and Congress year after year under the antitrust laws permitted that condition to prevail in the steel industry.

Senator BORAH. Congress had nothing to do with that, Mr. Lewis. The Congress passed the law and it was the business of the Department of Justice to enforce it.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, Congress did nothing about having the Department of Justice act upon it.

Senator BORAH. Congress had nothing to do with creating the Attorney General.

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, but Congress had the right to memorialize the Department of Justice to start suit against that steel company.

Senator BORAH. But it ought not to be necessary for Congress to memorialize a man to do his solemn duty.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, who was President about that time? [Laughter.]

Senator BORAH. May I ask you who is President now while it is going on.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, the only difference is that I understand that the man who is now President is in sympathy with every legitimate effort to stop this condition of which we are complaining.

Senator BORAH. Sympathy will not stop it.

Mr. LEWIS. No, but the enactment of this law will.

Senator BORAH. Then if this bill will do it I am for the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. You are talking of prices now?

Senator BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, well——

Senator BORAH. I am in entire sympathy with your view with reference to the labor proposition. The American workman has the absolute right to choose where he shall work, whether he shall be in a union or out of it, and corporations have no right whatever to interfere with his voluntary choice; that is all right. But, what I am speaking of are these people who are now doing the same thing that you say they have always been doing.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, I think they are, Senator; I think they are doing the same thing now they have always been doing, and they are doing it under a closed-shop arrangement in the steel industry through their code of fair competition. The steel companies have imposed the closed shop in the steel and iron industry——

Senator BORAH. I am not censuring the N.R.A. under the National Recovery Act. What I say is that the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law will aid the N.R.A. and not hurt it. The N.R.A. alone cannot do this job.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, of course, I am not this morning qualified to enter into a discussion on the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other observations, Mr. Lewis?

Mr. LEWIS. Just briefly, Senator, I have the following suggestions and amendments to offer:

On page 7, section 201, relating to the composition of the Board, the Board "shall be composed of 7 members," beginning on the third line, 2 representatives of the employers and 2 of employees, and 3 dissociated with either, may result in subordinated representatives of the employers and employees to the rule of advisers or assisters, I mean the representatives of labor and the representatives of industry who should be charged with the responsibility of decisions.

The policy of the Recovery Act is declared to be:

> To induce and maintain unity of action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervisions.

I think that the responsibility of these decisions should primarily be placed upon the representatives of industry and representatives of labor on this Board, rather than to put in three members from elsewhere than the ranks of labor and industry, and put labor and industry in as advisers.

Now labor does not want a chance to advise. The representatives of labor do not want to have to come in and hunt up three members of the National Labor Board to see what they think on a certain industrial situation in a certain city of industry. Labor wants a chance to participate on equal terms with industry, and it wants to assume the responsibilities of such participation.

So I would say that from every practical standpoint, from the standpoint of incurring greater confidence in the Board, from the standpoint of its action of administration and operation, a change to make an equally divided number of representatives of industry and labor, with a governmental representative as the chairman, would be preferable to the representation that is now set forth in the act.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, we will give consideration to that suggestion.

Mr. LEWIS. On page 6, Senator, lines 14 and 15.

Senator WAGNER. That has already been taken care of.

Mr. LEWIS. I will pass that then. Section 206 on page 16, line 10, I think could be amended so as to authorize arbitration only on the joint submission of both parties to a controversy, rather than "any party."

Senator WAGNER. I agree to that. I was going to propose that change.

Mr. LEWIS. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. That is acceptable to you, Senator Wagner?

Senator WAGNER. Oh, yes; I was going to suggest that to the committee.

Mr. LEWIS. On page 9, Senator, section 204, it reads:

> The Board may, either by itself or through its agents, offer its services to the parties to any labor dispute as conciliator or mediator in such dispute, and may act as conciliator or mediator for the parties who accept such offer.

I think that is essential and necessary, insofar as the purposes of the Board relating specifically so the basic unfair labor practices are concerned, but I really think that the Board would be sort of overwhelmed and immersed with those duties, when they are taken on a broad scale and applicable throughout industry as a whole, and I really think that in a measure such a volume of mediation and conciliation might detract somewhat from the prestige of the Board and render a little less effective its general supervision over these basic unfair labor practices.

Now, just in connection with that, I have a thought with relation to section 304 (b), on page 23, and in conjunction with counsel for the United Mine Workers have this revised to suggest for the consideration of the committee. It deals with the scope of authority of the Board, and seeks to preserve within industry those tribunals already set up there for their specific functions, without giving them, of course, any rights on the basic authority of the National Board. The proposed amendment is as follows:

SEC. 304 (b). Any term of a contract or agreement of any kind which conflicts with the provisions of this Act is hereby abrogated, and every employer who is a party to such contract or agreement shall immediately so notify his employees by appropriate action: Provided, That nothing in this Act shall be held to impair the right of tribunals established by codes of fair competition approved under the National Industrial Recovery Act or by collective-bargain agreements valid under the provisions of this Act, to hear and determine disputes concerning hours, wages and conditions of employment to the extent provided in such code or agreement, and where such hearing and determination does not involve recognition of any unfair labor practices.

I merely submit that for such consideration as the committee might want to give to it, as a matter of simplification.

The CHAIRMAN. We will appreciate that, Mr. Lewis. Does that finish your suggestions, Mr. Lewis?

Mr. LEWIS. I have nothing further except I do think this Board should not be attached to any governmental department. I think it should be an independent agency acting under the authority of the President, by appointment of the President.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Lewis, I have just one question. What do you think will be the effect and the outcome of the failure of Congress to enact this legislation?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, I think it will be considered by industry as almost a validation of the company union, and I think it would, perhaps, increase their efforts to impose company unions in industry, and that resistance on the part of the workers would be rapidly crystallized and would flare up in a way that would be productive of a great deal of labor unrest by means of strikes of wide-spread nature. It would be detrimental in every sense of the word.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Lewis.

Mr. LEWIS. Thank you, gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. I see Mr. Frank P. Walsh in the room. Mr. Walsh, will you come forward?

STATEMENT OF FRANK P. WALSH, CHAIRMAN NEW YORK POWER AUTHORITY, NEW YORK CITY

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name for the record?

Mr. WALSH. Frank P. Walsh.

The CHAIRMAN. New York City?

Mr. WALSH. New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. You are chairman of the New York Power Authority?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Recite your activities in connection with labor problems, beginning with the war, your service during the war.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Prior to the war, you were chairman of the Industrial Relations Board?

Mr. WALSH. I will try to go along, if I may, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I am not going to undertake, of course, to make an analysis of this law. I am not going to do it, first, for the reason that I do not feel as competent to do it as others who have been here, or as you gentlemen who are sitting here, who have been the target of all sorts of argument and all sorts of propaganda, some of you, during this entire generation, I might say.

I am not going to analyze it for another reason. I am in favor of it from beginning to end, because I think it is the evolutionary outgrowth of enlightened education over my time and over the time practically of every gentlemen sitting upon this committee. I believe that it is another step forward, a great step forward in the realization of economic freedom, which I believe is as important, if not more important, than political freedom.

I am not going to analyze it for the reason that I think it contains all the principles which are great factors in bringing about industrial justice, and because, as a piece of bill drafting, I think it is most excellent.

I think, perhaps, I might make some contribution here today by recalling, perhaps, more than stating, refreshing your minds, if I may do so, on the evolution of which I have spoken. My attention to these questions was specifically directed 20 years ago in the act that was passed which bore the name of Senator Borah, and I do not recall the name of the Member of the House of Representatives, which created the Commission on Industrial Relations of the United States Government. There was $500,000 appropriated and spent on that investigation. I say this because I read in the papers within the last few days, that there are certain organizations in this country who think that an investigation ought to be made before this bill is passed. Upon that board there were 5 members representing the employers of this country that came from the National Industrial Conference and the Manufacturers' Association, 5 representing the employers drawn from the American Federation of Labor, and 3 representing the public. I happened to be the chairman of that commission.

I can speak with freedom about the accomplishment, if any, it made, because the report that has become the report of that Commission was designated, and properly designated, as the "Staff Report." We were required to bring to our assistance those in the United States that had made special studies of this subject, and we drew upon those acquainted with economics in all of the leading universities of this country.

We were required at that time, also, to hold public hearings so that the public mind might become educated upon the situation existing in industry and the cause of industrial unrest. In many respects the situation in this country was paralleled by the situation today. We were under the stress of no war, or threatened war. Efforts had been made for years and years, beginning in a very small and weak way, to educate the people along the lines of collective bargaining, and to bring about better conditions, or a more equal distribution of the fruits of industry, than had existed theretofore. Great friction had arisen in some parts of the country. We were almost in a state of armed industrial war. One of the largest railroads in this country maintained an arsenal at their headquarters. Conflicts were numerous. Private armies were common in some of the great industries in outlying districts, and in the centers of population even. The spy system was at its very height. The same efforts that are being made by the same persons, or their ancestors, I mean their industrial ancestors, were at work at that time to prevent collective bargaining, to abridge the right of a workingman to join any organization of his own choice and to act collectively through his own representatives.

Now I want to say this, that my experience in that Commission—an experience to which I will refer a little later on, if I can bring my mind to it at the logical time—has convinced me that the opposition to measures such as this Wagner bill, the opposition to the formation of that Commission on Industrial Relations during the Taft administration, the opposition to every law, Child Labor Law, for the protection of the life and limb of workers engaged in industry, for every law that diminished or had a tendency to diminish profits, the opposition came from a comparatively small number of industries and a comparatively small number of individuals in those industries. The potent influence was due to the fact that they were the large industries, they were the industries that were further away in management from the actual worker than the other industries, they were the industries that the diminution of 1 cent an hour might bring an immense fortune in a very few days on account of the great number of persons that were engaged in the industry, or the increase of a half-hour or an hour in a balance sheet at the end of the year might show millions of profits.

Therefore, as I say, I would pay no attention, and I do pay no attention to the assertions that are made in the newspapers today to the alleged fact that there are very few people or very few members of these large international unions, and that they should not get the consideration which they are demanding, vocally demanding, by such gentlemen as have been on the witness stand today, and as have appeared before you many times. They are the persons who have established, after struggle, whatever standards they have established, and through their early work have brought about a condition of the public mind that brings the Senate of the United States, through one of its important committees, here today, to listen to their voice and creating a forum, which we have had many times before, where we may hear both sides of the question, always, I say, with the same result.

Now that investigation, to make this as brief as I can, brought out all of the principles that are contended for here today. There was a division in that Commission, so far as the personal views of the members of it were concerned. It was diverse. There were hardly any two who agreed to all of the conclusions. Why? It came from the same reasons, it came from surroundings, birth, environment. Those who had to labor for a living perhaps had a different view. They got their practical political economy in the factory or on the streets of a great city. Their views were different from those of a person that perhaps was educated along the line of ancient or modern economics in the university. Self-interest, motive, and all those things, cut a figure, but when it came down to the fundamentals, such as you are considering today, there was no diversity of opinion.

There was a diversity, perhaps, of machinery. There was a difference, perhaps, in the passion in which they spoke, but as for a real system of collective bargaining and representative democracy in industry, there was no diversity of opinion, and there cannot be, I claim, in any judicially, cooly considered body in a public forum where both sides can be heard.

I want to say just a word or two, to give you a little history of my experience and perhaps of a few of my views, in answering what has been said today. It sounds like an echo of the ancient past to hear the opposition to this bill. It would be almost foolish for me to warn you gentlemen against propaganda. I can look at Senator Wagner and see the dents in his forehead today because of the propaganda that has been going on in various spots in the last few weeks.

Therefore I say it is one of the reasons for a bill of this kind, that when a question of this sort comes up, where the public mind might be deeply affected, there is some person in Washington all the time—now you know they haven't gotten to any member of industry, any number of industrialists or to any number of corporations—but some gentleman steps up, he is generally a secretary, when he is talking about organizers, who would be ashamed to tell his own pay, his own emolument, but he tells you he represents 75,000 people who are opposed to your bill. They come down on this great subject where we ought to be getting together, where the life of the country makes it important that we should get together, going along the same old lines that they did in the preindustrial relations days. This important body passed a resolution saying that at this time you gentlemen ought to investigate, or a new investigating committee ought to investigate the salaries of organizers of labor unions.

Now I am here today on a message of peace. I believe you are going to pass this bill, and I believe it is going to be the greatest step forward in industrial democracy which has ever been taken. I believe it is going to be one of the benefits, one of the blessings—and there are a good many of them—that has grown out of our experience during this depression.

I notice the name of one of the gentlemen signed to that, to inquire into your salary, and I think the salary is about a dollar and a quarter an hour—we will take it by the hour, but we might take his by the minute—and this gentleman who protests and lends his name to the investigation in this momentous hour of hours, when we are trying to lift the whole Nation to an economic basis, when we are looked upon as setting an example for the entire world, this gentleman comes forward and says, "What we ought to investigate is how much an organizer for the union is getting." There was one of these gentlemen sitting next to me while Mr. Lewis was talking, and he figured it quickly for me, and that gentleman is getting $650 an hour. And he thinks there ought to be an investigation made. And so it goes along. It is the same old story.

The idea, for instance, that there is something in the labor union that causes them to get together. To do what? To destroy an industry. To destroy their own lives. To destroy the lives of their families. The basic thing that is always overlooked in these arguments, on the part of those who oppose such measures as the one before you today, is based upon that idea, that there is something almost criminal, something terribly wasteful in the idea of giving labor a free hand, a complete economic freedom in dealing with the employers, and in dealing with their own industry.

The basic thing is this: If that industry is retarded, if that industry is destroyed, they starve, they have no means of livelihood. If, on the other hand, the industry is not carried on in a way that is just and fair to those employees, the result is strikes, lockouts, and cessation of work. Why, then that great industry, from the employer's side is broken down in its profits. So there is a balance there in the law of compensation. That is so clear and so plain, unless it is retarded, that I do not see how any intelligent person can gainsay the argument—part of it I heard here today, and practically all of it I read in the record or the newspapers—it must depend upon that. It is found when free play is given that is accomplished to a very great extent, as far as it can be accomplished under our sustem of government and under our system of distribution, with which basically I do not disagree, but of which I am a sincere and vigorous critic, of some of its administrations.

Now after the Commission on Industrial Relations, I recall, as I say, the report upon that was made by the staff, and you will find the support of every principle that you have in here 21 years old. To this has been added the experience of that 21 years, because there has been a succession, and I am glad to say it, as a lover of this country and of my Government, I am glad to say the tradition has run true at all times in the Congress of the United States, there has never been a time that there has not been somebody battling upon the floor for administrations along this line. A La Follette; a Wagner; a Borah—I could mention very many of them who are here and who have gone, that have battled for that, and they have brought us down, in an educational way, to where we are today.

Now the best parallel I think we have for this is our experience in war time. The War Labor Board of course, had its basis in an Executive order of the President of the United States.

Now it has been stated, and it has been stated since this hearing has been in progress, that the only force that it had behind it was the force of public sentiment. That is a very great mistake. It had the most powerful force behind it, perhaps, of any organization that has ever existed in this country. It had the action of a courageous President behind it. It had an action that was quick and decisive. I might say this, in all of the 1,270 cases that were submitted to us, to this Board, there were decisions covering just under 1,000,000 of employees, not at all indicating the matters that were settled, because perhaps the settlement in one factory would be a settlement of the whole industry, they would go along with it, so that those who have attempted to analyze it, to produce certain statistics, say that there were probably over 2,000,000 employees affected by it.

Now, at the outbreak of the war, and in the early days of the war, there were a great many bodies that had to do with these industrial conditions, that is, in the Government itself. We had the Shipping Board, the Army and Navy, the Aircraft, the Railroad Administration, the Fuel Administration, and many others. There were strikes in shipyards, copper mines, munition plants, the packing industry. It came to the point where the absolute cessation of production of foodstuffs for this country and for a great part of Europe was threatened by a general strike in the packing houses, where they were paying men 30 cents an hour and working under conditions that were exposed as intolerable conditions.

Now I would like to say again at this point, I do not condemn these men that are the owners of these industries, nor do I condemn those that are the managers of them, but I do say that with our modern development of industry, the machine age, or whatever you call it, it calls for some interposition by the Government such as you propose here.

We hear arguments in favor of company unions and against regular trade unions. A trade union has some power. It can have a war chest perhaps, funds when a strike is called; it can do so many things, it can do what so many of them are so splendidly doing, operating laboratories to bring their craft and their art to a higher standard of efficiency, so that they may be more valuable to industry, so that they may have more of a share in its fruits, so it may be making laws to preserve the lives of these people, and, finally—and this is the greatest of all—it can educate them. These men who are appearing here, representing the unions of this country, have been the real educational force there. Their progenitors and those who are associated with them today are bringing the country to an education that makes possible such a law as this is today.

Now you could say, "Well, a company union is all right. We will have that in one factory." We have observed that. We have observed it in the investigations. We have observed it every day. When there is a scarcity of labor, why, the company man, the unorganized man, comes up closer all the time to the standards set by the others, as to wages and conditions. When there is a great inuflx of labor, or a depression, why, they just give them whatever they please. The standards set up and fought for carried us through this depression. Practically every labor union in the country was destroyed financially, or very much hampered, but they did carry through, and they are here, not only to speak for those of their own organization that pay dues and carry this burden, but they are here to speak for the millions of the voiceless ones that are trapped, or coerced, or fooled into company unions, or who are in remote places where they have not had the opportunity for education that the labor unions have had.

Now, the effort that was made to coordinate this thing was varied. I am giving you this from recollection, but it can be readily ascertained in the library. The first effort that was made to do something during the war I would call the Gompers-Baker agreement. That is Secretary of War Baker and Mr. Gompers. That is the agreement as to the maintenance of the pre-war status of labor. In other words, it was a sort of an implied arrangement that neither side should take advantage of the war situation. The unions of this country, far from being a subversive force, far from being a force that would destroy, were the ones that upheld that. They made the sacrifices. They went along with the Government. They entered into that agreement. It was not a workable agreement because it was found, very shortly afterward, that conditions in certain industries were at such a low ebb that the men were not getting a living wage, and the hours were so exhausting and fatiguing that the structure could not be depended upon to carry out the manufacture even of necessary war essentials.

So I think the next thing that was organized was the President's Mediation Commission, a very fine commission, that went about through the country trying to find out the specific causes of unrest in particular localities and to make suggestions, general and specific for their alleviation.

Then there was a War Conference Board called. That functioned for a few weeks, made recommendations, some very good ones, but they were not carried out.

Now, the War Labor Policies Board performed a function, but it was not given power enough. It was only to declare policies. Some of the policies declared at an early stage in the war, before it could be anticipated exactly what was going to occur or the extent of our necessities for the protection of essential war industries or other factors of that kind, which left it practically rather an academic board.

Now, when the War Labor Conference Board was created, out of it came the National War Labor Board. It was created by a frank recognition of the American Federation of Labor. That is proper and you cannot do anything else at this time. You may be a critic of that organization, you may be a critic with the organizations which are affiliated with it, but at the same time if you are going to deal with organized labor you have to deal with the American trade-union movement. There are other side issues and they grow, they expand, they get different views. While necessarily you cannot avoid it, you are going to deal with the American trade movement as it exists today. Nevertheless, there is room for expansion, just as there is in other organizations.

Perhaps these questions that come up of craft unions, unions within industries, and correlative questions, those questions are less open to a natural development which must come through the intelligence, in my opinion, of the workers themselves.

Now the A. F. of L. was recognized, and the National Industrial Conference Board was likewise recognized, and the success that the National War Labor Board had was due to the fact that it had a principles such as you are setting up here, of principles that are definite but nevertheless elastic enough to meet all contingencies.

The code that was drawn up by the National Conference Board became the code of the National War Labor Board, and it was under that code, resisted by very few industrialists, it was under that code that our country was the only one that operated through the war without the cessation of 1 day in the production of essential war materials, which included everything that was not only necessary, like munitions and the like, but every cognate production that you could possibly imagine, even down to transportation, street car, urban and interurban transportation.

Now, I want to say here that I believe, under the broad terms of this law, with the provision that you have a right to make your own rules and regulations from time to time in conformity with the general principles of this law, that your education or our education since that time, has made this a much better code and a more workable code, than the code that we had during the war.

I would be very glad to give you the principles that were laid down there, so that you may have them before you. I do not have them with me now. If you want to compare them, I would be glad to give them to you. Upon comparison I find these principles to be fully as potent, they have all the strength, and are more flexible.

Now I think, if I may be allowed to give an opinion here, as I suppose I am asked to do, that this is the most important thing in my view that has been done or proposed for National recovery. The act we have here today I think goes to the very heart of the whole thing, it goes to the increasing of mass purchasing power, of allowing industry to go to its very highest point in the production of necessaries and even the luxuries of life. I believe that it is something upon which we can build, and I think we ought to go at it very bravely. I think it is highly necessary in this emergency, but I think it is highly necessary for all time.

We can all speculate on what might have happened, but I certainly believe that if this law had been put in force 25 years ago, perhaps, or longer ago than that, it might have been a very great factor in averting the calamity that has befallen us in the last few years, and therefore I think we ought to step out bravely without any apology for the law, and say, "Yes, the emergency makes this necessary now." Perhaps the emergency would not have been here if we had it a long time ago. I feel this is a law for ever and ever, except as we progress in thought and except as we progress in the determination to see that the people who produce the wealth of this country have a fair share of its fruit.

Senator WAGNER. Well, that was regarded by some critics as a perfectly vicious proposition.

Mr. WALSH. I know that.

Senator WAGNER. Lincoln had the same thought that you expressed. He said that way back.

Mr. WALSH. Did he?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I think the same thing then. They tell me that Aristotle or Omar Khayyam, or someone else said it, but I am glad that it was Mr. Lincoln.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I just want to say what occurred, briefly, after the war. Perhaps that would throw light on the necessity of this. Now, when the war was over, why some well-intentioned people, some of the organized labor people, many of them, and some of—what would I call them?—the ingenious uplifters had an idea that something like this should be carried along, which we are trying to do today. So a law was drafted and went to Congress. There was a kind of a blow-up in the discussion of it. I know the President at that time was in favor of it, but it just sort of went by the boards.

Now, then, he called, however, for an industrial conference. The first industrial conference was in 1919. The idea was at that time, the asserted idea, was an effort to perpetuate the general principles laid down by the War Labor Board, and to create some kind of judicial, or quasi-judicial and administrative body, such as you propose here, to carry them out, to furnish the machinery and carry them out. The Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of the Interior were joint chairmen of it. It was great. It was a great agency drawn from all over the country. It had representatives of employers, employees, and the public on it. I suppose there were probably 200 or more of the most prominent people in the country who attended that congress.

Now that is the only effort, and I think that was largely because it was more like a political convention, a gathering of men of diverse and antagonistic views, simply impossible to amalgamate them. I wouldn't want to mention many of the names now. A good many of them are dead. But they split over collective bargaining. They split to the extent that it would have been necessary and futile to have any vote. It got no record and had no chance of doing it. The industrialists split and the members of the public representatives divided.

But later on they had another conference. Now that was the one over which presided Secretary Wilson and the late President of the United States, Mr. Herbert Hoover. They produced a code of principles and standards that was comparable with this. They went along the same line, in principle at least, and they created a board for their interpretation and application. They made a report on it. It was widely reported. No action was taken on it, either by the President or the Congress of the United States.

In the years 1920 and 1921 we had a depression where there was no forward action on the part of labor, no forward action on the part of those that believed in economic freedom. From 1923 to 1929, in those dizzy years, there was no forward advance. The industries were wallowing in profits and the only criticisms we heard then were on the part of the poorly paid laborers which were always present, that they were not getting their fair share, and the skilled laborers who knew they were not getting their fair share, and on the side of the industrialists, the bitter campaign that they made against the wearing of silk shirts and the use of Ford cars by employees to go to work with. 1923 to 1928, therefore, was practically a blank.

So we come up to today and we pick up, I hope, where we left off. I mentioned, when the Senator was not here, where we left off from the Borah bill of 31 years ago, and our recommendations down through the war, and the board that was made successful to carry us through that war industrially, down to today.

I simply wish to reiterate the thought that I am in favor of the principles of this bill. I believe that it is so well drawn although I could criticize certain parts of it, but it would do no good to do it here, that if this bill is passed as it stands today it will be such a step forward that there will be no difficulty in patching it up, either by legislation or by rules and regulations which you are entitled to make concerning anything that could be considered a substantial evil. I think that you will not only make it an approach to the accomplishment of the effort of recovery, but I believe you will lay down a principle that will cut a splendid figure in preventing these terrible depressions in the future.

I almost feel like apologizing for talking to this committee, because I know everyone on it, and every intelligent man who looks into this question of company unions and who has an atom of fairness in his make-up, will have no difficulty in answering any of the propaganda against this bill. Thank you.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Thank you very much, Mr. Walsh, Mr. Frey.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I am representing the Trade Union Unity League. I would like some assurance that opponents of this bill will be heard at this hearing. So far there has been a very impressive array of opinion marshaled in favor of this bill. I would like to make it known that there are people who represent sections of the workers' rights, not representatives of corporations alone, that are opposed to this bill in toto. I want some assurance that we will be heard.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I am only acting in Senator Walsh's absence as chairman of this committee, but I am informed by the clerk that the opponents of the bill are to be heard next week. I suggest that you get in touch with the clerk.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the representatives of the organizations that we are not excessively stocked with finances, it is very difficult to stay over here for a week or so. I have been here since Wednesday waiting to be called. I would like to be heard this afternoon.

Senator BORAH. Whom do you represent?

Mr. DUNN. My name is William F. Dunn. I represent the national committee of the Trade Union Unity League, which comprises some 125,000 organized workers in steel, coal, metal, and many other industries.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Frey, will you please come forward?

STATEMENT OF JOHN L. FREY, METAL TRADES DIVISION, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Senator LA FOLLETTEE. Mr. Frey, will you please give your name for the purpose of the record?

Mr. FREY. John L. Frey, secretary-treasurer of the metal trades department, American Federation of Labor. The department includes all of the metal-trades unions in the United States. I am also a member of the Labor Advisory Board of the N.R.A.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Now if you will proceed in your own way, Mr. Frey, to make any statement that you desire to make concerning this bill, or any suggestions you have to offer, and then at the conclusion of your statement, if any member of the committee desires to ask you questions, that will be done.

Mr. FREY. The international unions, comprising the Metal Trades Department, instructed me to present certain views which they held relative to this bill and the importance of enacting the bill. Just before I touch upon the specific subjects they desire to have me bring before the committee, I would like to refer very briefly to the statement that Senator Wagner made at the opening of this hearing to the effect that unless a better system of industrial relations were set up, the difference in the wages being paid and the prices being charged would greatly retard recovery.

I want to support the position which Mr. Hillman took yesterday to the effect that the failure to pay sufficient wages was one of the principal reasons for the depression overtaking us in 1929. The report of the Interstate Commerce Commission indicates that in 1929 there was $785,234,842 less wages paid than in 1920. In other words, although the railroads were hauling many more passenger-miles and ton-miles in 1929 than they were in 1920, there was almost $800,000 less in wages paid. The census of manufactures gives equal evidence of what was taking place. In 1933, the value of our manufactured products was $60,555,000,000. It had increased very rapidly when the census was taken 2 years later, for the census of 1925 indicates that the value of our manufactured products had increased to $62,713,000,000, or approximately $2,200,000,000. The census for 1927 indicated a further increase in the value of our manufactured products. The total volume of wages paid, according to the census of manufactures, in the manufacturing industries in 1923 was $11,092,000,000. In 1925, when the value of our manufactured goods had increased almost $2,022,000,000, the total volume of wages paid in the manufacturing industries was $279,328,000 less than in 1923. In 1927, when there had been an increase in the value of manufactured goods over 1929, the total volume of wages paid in the manufacturing industries was still $160,495,000 less than in 1923. So that as our industries were increasing the value of what they produced from 1923, the total volume of wages was actually decreasing.

The best authority we have on national income, Dr. Wilfred I. King's monumental work on that subject, the textbook of all of the economists in Washington at the present time, shows, in one of its tables, that the total volume of wages paid in the United States to wage earners, regardless of their occupation, in 1928 was $649,000,000 less than in 1927. So that the wage earners of our country were $649,000,000 less able to buy the products of American industry in 1928 than they had been in 1927. It seems to us that unless there is some method of having the volume of wages bear an economically sound relationship to the wealth produced by industry, that this attempt to effect recovery may be greatly retarded.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the percentage of decrease in wages during the years of depression as compared with 1928? Have you given those already?

Mr. FREY. No; I merely gave the figures from 1923 to 1927, inclusive, from the census of manufactures.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know the percentage of decrease in income of the workers of the country during the depression.

Mr. FREY. No; I do not. I haven't got that here.

Senator BORAH. Mr. Frey, can you state what the average annual income, the annual salary or wage of the ordinary working man was, per year, during that period?

Mr. FREY. I would not attempt to do that, Senator, because I have not got the data here, and I might be one- or two- or perhaps three-hundred dollars off.

Senator BORAH. You spoke of Professor King.

Mr. FREY. Yes.

Senator BORAH. Professor King said a working man, an average working man with a family of four or five, had to live on from $1,800 to $2,000 a year.

Mr. FREY. Yes; well, I know this, that all of the reports from the census of manufactures and from the Bureau of Labor Statistics indicate that we have never had that average in reality.

The interests of the metal trades department in this bill is both of the features that strengthen the effectiveness of the National Labor Board and which place certain restrictions on the methods employers have adopted to determine the form of organization that their employees may enjoy.

Since the National Industrial Recovery Act was enacted, and since the last National Labor Board has begun to function, there has been an apparent determination on the part of many employers in large industries to set aside and evade both the letter and the spirit of the act, and to set up labor organizations which indicate that the employer is violating that provision of section 7 (a) which provides that the employer shall not interfere as well as intimidate and coerce.

Yesterday much evidence was offered indicating that employers have been intimidating and coercing. I want to emphasize the importance of that interference part of the law, because all of the company unions of which I have any knowledge, which have been set up since the law was enacted, are all the result of direct interference on the employer's part. Much evidence was introduced yesterday by President Green.

I do not desire to burden the record, except with one document. One of the early codes in the steel and iron industry, after that first great code had been passed, was for the steel casting industry. On December 6, the code authority sent out to all steel foundries in the United States, and I will file this as a document, instructions on the setting up of local and national industrial relations adjustment boards. In the early part of their instructions they say:

> Each plant in the industry is required to nominate one employer representative and an alternate and to request the employees thereof to elect from their own number one employee representative and an alternate. The names of the representatives so nominated and elected will be filed with Steel Founders' Society of America in New York, and will constitute a panel from which there will be selected such committees as may be required.

These committees being the ones to take up the questions that arise between employees and employers over terms of employment.

Now, the interesting feature in this connection is that from this panel of men, elected in this manner, the executive vice president of the association under the code is to determine which ones shall serve on a committee to hear a specific complaint that is called before it. I want to read one other section.

> No fees will be paid to representatives of an employer or employee. Each company will absorb the expense of its representatives, whether of employer or employees, while engaged in their duties as members of conciliation committees. The representatives will be paid their regular salaries or wages as well as any traveling or out-of-pocket expenses. It is believed that in most cases the services of a public-spirited person to serve as chairman may be secured free of charge, except for out-of-pocket expenses, which will be paid from the general funds of the society. Where such arrangements are not possible, then a per-diem rate of not more than $10, exclusive of out-of-pocket expenses, will be allowed and this will likewise be paid by the society.

So that these men elected at a shop-committee meeting will constitute the panel from which are to be drawn those to sit on a labor adjustment board, locally and nationally, and who are to have their expenses paid by their employers.

Then, after much care not to evade the law in the election of these committees, they do say this as a suggestion:

> It would be appropriate for the management to offer such necessary assistance as may be desired, such as providing a suitable meeting place, stationery, supplies, etc., all with a view to assisting the employees in holding an election for the selection of their representatives on such absolutely independent basis as will result in the selection of employee representatives by none other than employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you desire that document to go into the record?

Mr. FREY. I want it all to go in the record, Mr. Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be placed in the record.

Mr. FREY. I merely want to call attention to certain developments, and here is the set-up within an industry for a local and a national industrial adjustment board, the representatives of which are to be selected at a company union or shop-representation election, who are then to have their expenses paid by the employer, or by the society, and in turn are to be subject to selection by the executive vice president of the employers of the association. What chance would labor have in receiving practical consideration of any complaint that they had to make? The operation of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and of the National Recovery Administration, of the National Labor Board, of the National Conciliation Board, and of the Conciliation Division of the Department of Labor, have not been able, up to the present time, to adjust a large number of the complaints that have been coming in from the beginning.

Scarcely had the law been enacted when the various international unions affiliated with the metal trades department sent in complaints that the law was being violated, that company unions were being forced upon employees, that men were being discharged because they opposed company unions or because they had joined a union of their industry or craft. The department found that it was no longer possible to handle these grievances in a general way, and one national officer was taken from an international union to devote his entire time to the one question of handling and following up these complaints. Since that time, since last July, this officer, or rather employee of the metal trades department, who is an international officer, has been swamped, the Conciliation Division of the Labor Department has been swamped, the Conciliation Board has been swamped. The National Labor Board has had an infinite number of cases of this kind coming before it. The great majority of complaints that have come in because of discrimination, discharge, are still unadjusted, because the employers refused to yield to the splendid efforts made by the Conciliation Department or Division of the Department of Labor, the National Labor Board, and the Conciliation Board.

I want to call your attention to just one case that is typical of our experience. Early last fall there was a strike took place in the port of New York, in one of the ship-repair yards. It was caused by the discharge of 1 man in 1 department because he was an officer of the local union. The case was decided by the National Labor Board about the first of December, if my memory serves me right. The decision of the Board was that the strike should be declared off, that all the strikers should be reemployed, and that the questions existing should then be taken up between the firm and the men's representatives.

The largest group of shipyards, except one, in the port of New York assured the Board that they would put back all of their strikers to work within 2 weeks, and they carried out their promise. The other group, known as the Todd Shipyards, also accepting this agreement, had never carried it into effect. The men who were on strike when the National Labor Board adjusted this dispute, the first of last December, are still on strike, with the exception of a little handful.

But the Todd Shipyards on the 15th of December, or some 2 weeks after the National Labor Board had handed down its award, held a shop election for a company union, in which all of the strikebreakers participated, and now they tell you blandly and hypocritically, "We have an organization in our establishments. It is what the men wanted. Here is the result of the votes that were taken."

So that under such circumstances as that, a hollow mockery and a farce is made of the provisions that labor shall have the right to organize free from interference, intimidation, or coercion, to choose the organization they want and select their representatives in a manner satisfactory to them.

I have been connected with trade-union activities for a number of years. I have tried to understand the history of industrial disputes and what lies behind them, and I am of the opinion that this bill, introduced by Senator Wagner, is the most important one affecting industrial relations which has yet been considered by Congress during the present generation, with the possible exception of the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction bill, because this bill brings to a focus an issue which has been rapidly developing during the past 35 or 40 years—the issue of whether employers shall have the free unlimited right to organize for their own self-protection and shall then have the privilege to use these national organizations of theirs for the preventing of wage earners who are equally American citizens from enjoying that same right to organize, because the company-union program that has developed in this country mainly has a close relationship to the yellow-dog contract which workmen were compelled to sign in order that they could either secure work or retain the job that they had.

Thirty-five years ago, or approximately that time, such organizations as the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Metal Trades Association, and others of a similar type, began to preach the doctrine, through their secretaries and through their legal staffs, that American industry must prevent the existence of trade unionism. They have carried that out consistently since that time. All of you are familiar with the propaganda against the right of the American wage earner to organize that is found in many of our industries. You have heard their representatives appear every time when a measure is introduced in Congress which intends to improve the wage earner's condition. The men who are opposing this bill at the present time, the identical men, in many cases, are the same individuals who visited the several States years ago to prevent the enactment of workmen's compensation. They are the men who on all occasions are the spokemen of these employers.

Now Congress declared in the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction bill that yellow-dog contracts were null and void. Before that, several of the industrial States had done the same thing.

The question might be asked, "What is the difference now?" Well, the difference, gentlemen, is this, that the form of employers' organizations in this country have assumed an entirely different status from what they enjoyed before the enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act. They did not have complete organization. There were many employers who remained outside of the organization of their industrial group, but the law which was intended to give a "new deal" to employers, to wage earners, to everyone else in the country, made it practically mandatory that the employers should organize. They were told it was impossible to secure a code, unless they could bring evidence that the group calling for the code represented a practical majority of the industrial associations.

And so, in addition to the free right that employers have always had to organize, this Recovery Act made it practically mandatory upon every employer to be organized in order to get the full benefit of the law. And the administration of the N.R.A. found it advisable to assist these employers in perfecting their organizations and in making them more compact, and there is no objection on our part to what has taken place.

The metal trades know of no way by which men can take up and adjust their industrial problems except through organization which enables them to accumulate facts, analyze them, adopt policies, endeavor to carry them into effect, and learn from experience whether the policies are wise or not. But the law which made it so imperative upon industry to organize, if it was to secure the benefit of the National Industrial Recovery Act, did not place upon any department of the Government any obligation whatsoever to assist labor to organize. Instead of its being made a duty under the law to help labor organize to the same extent as the law made it mandatory—not mandatory in one sense of the word, but mandatory if employers were to get the benefit of the law—labor was merely given the guaranty that it had the right to organize for the purpose of carrying on collective bargaining free from any interference, intimidation, or coercion on the employer's part.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Frey, was there any difference in the mandatory character of the obligation placed upon the Industrial Recovery Administration, so far as facilitating and assisting in the organization is concerned, and the mandatory features of their responsibilities from an administrative point of view, so far as section 7 (a) was concerned?

Mr. FREY. The law raised no distinction at all.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Precisely.

Mr. FREY. But the practical conditions created through the operation of the law made it necessary for employers to organize as they never had before, because the codes were not given to labor, they were given to industrial groups, and the administration of the N.R.A. could not give a code to an industrial group unless the representatives of that group would bring in evidence that they represented a very large majority of the employers in that particular industry.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I personally fail to see any difference in the responsibilities and the mandatory character of the responsibilities of the Industrial Recovery Administration so far as section 7 (a) is concerned, and so far as the industrial organization is concerned.

Mr. FREY. Well, Senator, the practical result of what has happened is this——

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I know what the practical result is, but I do object to your saying that it is the difference in the mandatory responsibilities placed upon the Administration by the act of Congress. It is my view that the responsibilities of the Industrial Recovery Administration are just as mandatory, so far as section 7 (a) is concerned, as they are for any other section. It seems to me if you have any criticism to offer of the net result of the operation of this law, it could not be directed toward the statute, but toward the Administration.

Mr. FREY. I am not directing it toward the statute, Senator, and I am not offering this as one kind of criticism, because I am very heartily in support of what the N.R.A. is trying to do, and I think I will defend General Johnson as quickly as anyone, because of my intimate knowledge of the problems that are forced on his shoulders.

I did want to make it clear to the committee, however, that in the operation of the law labor up to the present time has been left largely to its own resources to organize.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I will agree with that.

Mr. FREY. While the necessities of the situation made it almost mandatory for the employers to organize. Now, in the face of that condition, a large number of employers now are using the strength of their organization to build up company unions, which will make anything like voluntary organization on the part of the employees impossible, and there lies one of the inequalities which I think can only be corrected by Senator Wagner's bill, which would make it impossible for these company unions to be brought into existence as they are at the present time.

Now, I think it is unnecessary for me to say anything about what a company union is—it has been referred to so frequently. It is a plan of organization devised by the employer, imposed through various methods upon the employees. It represents the employer's point of view, the type of an organization he wants his employees to enjoy, and it only endures so long as the company is willing that it should. Every company union in existence, because it is brought into existence by the employer, can be terminated merely by posting a notice in the shop, "The company no longer desires to have the company union."

Senator WAGNER. You cannot very well have equality in bargaining power if it is all on one side and control both parties to the bargain, it seems to me.

Mr. FREY. There is no equality of bargaining power where there is a company union, because the company union is represented merely by employees in the plant, and the important fact to bear in mind in connection with the company union movements is this, that the job is such as important thing to the wage earner, it means so much to his family, that the employee is continually fearful that he may do something which will displease his foreman, or displease his employer and lead to his losing that only method that he has of supporting his family and himself, the job. And the foremen in these plants, when they receive their instructions that their departments are expected to deliver a full vote, they know their job is more or less at stake if they fail to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. It would assist us, Mr. Frey, if you would put your manuscript in the record.

Mr. FREY. Unfortunately, Mr. Senator, I have no manuscript; I have just notes, but I will not take up much more of your time. I think it is unnecessary for me to do it.

I merely want to say this, in conclusion—and I am not covering some of the facts that I wanted to bring out—that there is no dodging of certain conclusions that the Congress must reach, unless labor and industry, through their chosen representatives, are to work out their problems, arising from their relationship as employer and employee, then two things must follow, unless industry can adjust its own internal problems, so far as labor is concerned, and labor inside of industry can get a fair and adequate hearing of what it wants. Then two things must follow in this country: One, a return to the law of the law of the jungle, where the strongest will hold his own as best he can, and the other is a much more strict regulation of what industry and labor can do on the part of the Government. The latter is not to be welcomed. The former should never be given any thought if we really are civilized people.

So far as the wage earners of this country are concerned, they have been watching what has developed in Europe. They are opposed to the methods of adjusting industrial relations that have been established in Russia, that have been established in Italy, that have been established in Germany, and that have been proposed in some of the other European countries, but some form of adjustment must come, some authority must exist, or else we will return to the law of the jungle where employers' associations will endeavor to strangle the last vestige of trade unionism on the part of American workmen, or where American workmen finding they have no other method, will make an effort to take recourse to the strength of organization and all of the unfortunate conditions that follow.

So it seems to us that the enactment of this bill is the most important consideration which Congress can have, if it becomes a law. Then industry, that has hoped it could safely evade section 7 (a) and (b) of the basic law, will quit these efforts, in large numbers at least, to set up these company unions, and the National Labor Board will have the necessary authority, where there are violations of the law, to bring the recalcitrant employers in line with the modern American spirit, as it has been indicated in all that we can call the "new deal."

Senator WAGNER. And as the experience has been in all these other legislations to improve conditions which the thoughtless industrialist has opposed, in the end the legislation redounds to his benefit as well as to labor.

Mr. FREY. To his benefit, Senator. The unfortunate fact is that the trouble, the antagonism that exists toward trade-union movements on the part of many employers is due to either lack of knowledge or stupidity on their part, because the condition that would be established if they sat down and discussed the industrial problems with the representatives of their employees would be so much more satisfactory than the present condition, that they would never return to it, any more than the American employer would return to the old system that existed before workmen's compensation was accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Frey.

STEEL FOUNDERS' SOCIETY OF AMERICA,
New York, N. Y., December 6, 1933.

To all steel foundries in the United States:

Subject: The industrial self-government plan to adjudicate all complaints of violations of the labor provisions of the Code of Fair Competition for the Steel Casting Industry

GENTLEMEN: The board of directors of Steel Founders' Society of America is designated as the "administrative agency" (otherwise known as the "code authority") for the Code of Fair Competition for the Steel Casting Industry, which was signed by the President of the United States on November 2, anp became effective on Monday, November 13, 1933.

General Johnson recently made the following statement in regard to the administration of codes by code authorities, trade associations, and other agencies of industrial self-government:

"The function of code administration lies primarily with the code authority provided for in each code. Nevertheless, it is the responsibility of the National Recovery Administration that the code be administered. Whenever, as in the bituminous-coal code, an industry is organized for self-discipline that function will be accorded it. But in many instances industries are not so organized that they have machinery appropriate to the adjustment of complaints of violations of the trade practice, and other provisions of their codes.

"The organization of very few industries is at this time appropriate for the adjustment of complaints of violations of the labor provisions of codes. While, in every case, where the authority is organized, adjustment of fair-trade practices will be left to the code authorities, as a general rule the code provides no plan for the adjustment of their labor provisions. The code authority will be permitted to function on labor disputes when provision is made for adequate representation of labor on all committees, boards, or other agencies set up to entertain and adjust complaints by employees against their employers for violations of labor provisions."

Complying with this requirement and for the purpose of assuring an equitable adjustment of complaints of violations of the labor provisions of the Code of Fair Competition for the Steel Casting Industry, a plan of procedure has been evolved, the essential principle of which is equal representation of employers and employees on any committees charged with the responsibility of investigating such complaints under the guidance of a neutral person who shall preside as chairman and have equal voting power with other members of the committee.

Each plant in the industry is required to nominate one employer representative and an alternate and to request the employees thereof to elect from their own number one employee representative and an alternate. The names of the representatives so nominated and elected will be filed with Steel Founders' Society of America in New York, and will constitute a panel from which there will be selected such committees as may be required.

All complaints, from whatever source, shall be referred immediately to Steel Founders' Society of America, 932 Graybar Building, 420 Lexington Avenue, New York, N.Y.; attention of Col. Merrill G. Baker, executive vice president.

Upon receipt of such complaints, the executive vice president will communicate with the complainant and the company against whom the complaint has been made, suggesting a friendly conference in an endeavor to reach a mutually satisfactory adjustment. This is predicated upon the assumption that the complainant has not already consulted with the employer before filing his complaint. Each party to the complaint will be requested to report the results of the conference to the executive vice president. If both advise that an agreement has been reached, the matter will be considered as closed.

If either party reports that a satisfactory conclusion was not reached, the other will be notified accordingly. The executive vice president shall then refer to the panel of names described above and select a conciliation committee of an equal number of employer and employee representatives, appointing one of them to act as secretary. No employer or employee representatives of the company named in the complaint may serve on the committee. The number to constitute the committee will be determined by the seriousness of the complaint. The Secretary of the committee shall communicate immediately with a Federal, circuit, or county judge in the vicinity (the choice being left to the discretion of the committee), requesting him to nominate a responsible citizen of the United States, not identified with the industry or financially or otherwise interested in the company against whom the complaint has been made, this neutral person to act as the chairman of the committee, with equal voting powers with other members of the committee. The executive vice president shall forward all information, including the original complaint and all correspondence pertaining thereto, as well as a copy of the Code of Fair Competition for the Steel Casting Industry, to the secretary, and the committee will be charged with the responsibility of making an investigation and report of its findings, together with recommendations for a disposition of the complaint.

The secretary, after consultation with the chairman, shall appoint a suitable time and place for a hearing, giving notice thereof to all members of the committee as well as the complainant and the employer, both of whom shall be invited to appear personally to testify, or to file such statement as they may desire. At the conclusion of the hearing, the secretary shall file with the executive vice president a report of the findings of the committee, signed by all members of the committee, unless there be any who dissent, in which case the dissenting opinion should likewise be filed. The executive committee of the board of directors of Steel Founders' Society of America shall review the case, and after giving full consideration to the facts and the recommendations of the conciliation committee, shall issue a ruling, both parties to the complaint being then notified thereof. If either party to the complaint refuses to accept the ruling, then the case will be referred to the board of directors of Steel Founders' Society of America for decision, which decision shall be final, subject, however, to the right of any dissenting party to file an appeal with the Administrator of the National Recovery Administration in Washington, D.C.

No fees will be paid to representatives of an employer or employee. Each company will absorb the expense of its representatives, whether of employer or employees, while engaged in their duties as members of conciliation committees. The representatives will be paid their regular salaries or wages as well as any traveling or out-of-pocket expenses. It is believed that in most cases the services of a public-spirited person to serve as chairman, may be secured free of charge, except for out-of-pocket expenses, which will be paid from the general funds of the society. Where such arrangements are not possible, then a per diem rate of not more than $10 exclusive of out-of-pocket expenses, will be allowed and this will likewise be paid by the society.

A graphical chart or flow sheet of the plan is attached.

SUGGESTIONS FOR PROCEDURE FOR ELECTION OF EMPLOYEE REPRESENTATIVES

The selection of employee representatives and alternates must be made by the employees of each plant in such manner as they themselves may choose. As a suggested method of procedure, the following observations may be helpful.

Many plants in the industry have what are known as "works councils", consisting of employer and employee members. Where such exist, it would be desirable to discuss this program in detail at a regular or special meeting of the council, called for the purpose. After proper presentation of the plan, the employees' representatives on the council should then be requested to make arrangements for the selection of representatives and alternates, which selection must be the expressed wish of the majority of the employees of the plant in question. It might be suggested that the employees hold an election, unless they have a more suitable or satisfactory plan of their own, advising the management, if such proposed election is held, of the result thereof, namely, the number of employees voting and the number of votes cast for the various candidates.

If the employees decide to follow the plan of holding an election for the selection of representatives, then such election should be conducted by and under the guidance of employees only, without management (that is to say, any supervisory labor), participating in such election in any manner whatsoever.

It would be appropriate for the management to offer such necessary assistance as may be desired such as providing a suitable meeting place, stationery, supplies etc., all with a view to assisting the employees in holding an election for the selection of their representatives on such absolutely independent basis as will result in the selection of employee representatives by none other than employees. The employees themselves should arrange all details of the election, select their own judges, tellers, etc.

For plants having no works councils, it is suggested that substantially the foregoing plan may likewise apply by presenting this subject to a selected representative number of employees of the plant and in turn requesting them to carry on in the manner described above.

Very truly yours,

MERRILL G. BAKER,
Executive Vice President.

METHOD OF ADJUDICATING LABOR QUESTIONS ARISING OUT OF ADMINISTRATION OF STEEL CASTING CODE representatives composed of one representative and one alternate appointed by the management of each plant in the industry who shall be reimbursed for traveling and out-of-pocket expenses by the companies by whom they are employed.

Conciliation committee composed of an equal number of management and employee representatives selected from national panels by executive vice president S.F.S.A., who shall name one such selected representative secretary of the conciliation committee, and a neutral member appointed by a Federal circuit or county judge to act as chairman of committee with voting power. He should be a prominent citizen in no way connected with a steel foundry, whose out-of-pocket expenses will be paid by the society and may receive a per diem fee. Conciliation committee shall consider facts and call for testimony, if necessary, reporting through the committee's secretary the findings and recommendations of the committee to the national panel of employee representatives, consisting of one representative and one alternate elected by the employees of each plant in the industry. Employee representatives serving on conciliation committee will be paid a sum equivalent to the wages normally earned at their regular occupations in their respective plants, plus traveling and out-of-pocket expenses, such wages and expenses to be borne by the companies by whom they are employed.

Executive committee S.F.S.A., who will give full consideration to committee's recommendations and make a ruling, binding upon both parties to the complaint, but a dissenting party may appeal to S.F.S.A. board of directors whose decision shall be final, subject to right of a dissenting party to file an appeal to N.R.A. administrator.

STATEMENT BY MRS. ELINORE MOREHOUSE HERRICK, ACTING CHAIRMAN REGIONAL LABOR BOARD, NEW YORK CITY

The CHAIRMAN. May we have your full name, Mrs. Herrick, for the record?

Mrs. HERRICK. Mrs. Elinore M. Herrick.

The CHAIRMAN. Your activities?

Mrs. HERRICK. Vice chairman of the Regional Labor Board in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to hear from you.

Mrs. HERRICK. I think I have heard so much of the discussion this morning in connection with the subject of company unions, that I am going to give you just one illustration that carries the company union principle to the nth degree, and then the rest of my paper, or practically the rest, I will be very glad to have inserted in the record.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

COMPANY UNIONS: A VAST INDUSTRIAL ISSUE

SENATOR WAGNER SETS FORTH THE GROWTH OF "EMPLOYER-DOMINATED" ORGANIZATIONS, TELLS OF THEIR EFFECT ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING, AND DISCUSSES HIS BILL WHICH IS DESIGNED TO PREVENT ECONOMIC WARFARE

[The company union has become a focal point in the industrial relations problem that confronts the Nation It was under vigorous debate during the N.R.A. hearing last week and it is dealt with in a bill, designed to eliminate strife between labor and industry, introduced in Congress by Senator Wagner, who has served as Chairman of the National Labor Board since that body came into existence. The subject, together with other phases of the problem, is discussed in the following article]

[By Robert F. Wagner, Senator from New York]

Despite the emergency language in which it is cloaked, the recovery program embodies principles of reform as well as revival. The statistical indicia of revival are not to be denied, but the need for reform is still acute. And there is substantial agreement as to the path that reform must take if we are to achieve any approximation to social justice and avoid the recurrence of cataclysmic depressions. The fruits of industry must be distributed more bounteously among the masses of wage earners who create the bulk of consumer demand.

This central problem has been evisaged broadly by the National Recovery Administration, led by General Johnson and ever subject to the dynamic personality and brilliant intelligence of President Roosevelt. But despite their best efforts, the major portion of the problem remains unsolved. While reemployment has swelled the total volume of wage payments, the real earnings of the individual working full time are slightly less than they were last March.

Some of the minimum-wage provisions under the codes are lower than the standards actually prevailing in industry and in most of the upper wage brackets there have been reductions in hours without corresponding rises in hourly rates of pay. Despite the ameliorative features of a share-the-work movement, it is hardly the road to prosperity.

NEED OF EQUALITY

The reasons for the present difficulty are not hidden. The constant readjustments necessary to strike a fair balance between industry and labor cannot be accomplished simply by code revisions or by general exhortations. They can be accomplished only by cooperation between employers and employees, which rests upon equality of bargaining power and the freedom of either party from restraints imposed by the other.

Congress recognized this when it enacted section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, restating the right of employees to deal collectively through representatives of their own choosing. But ambiguities of language and the absence of enforcement powers have enabled a minority of employers to deviate from the clear intent of the law and to threaten our entire program with destruction. Therefore, I have introduced a bill to clarify and fortify the provisions of section 7 (a), and I am sure that it will meet with the support of the vast majority of people interested in economic welfare.

COMPANY UNIONS

At the present time genuine collective bargaining is being thwarted immeasurably by the proliferation of company unions. Let me state at the outset that by the term "company union" I do not refer to all independent labor organizations whose membership lists embrace only the employees of a single employer. I allude rather to the employer-dominated union, generally initiated by the employer, which arbitrarily restricts employee cooperation to a single employer unit, and which habitually allows workers to deal with their employer only through representatives chosen from among his employees.

In the fall of 1933 a thoroughly reliable study was made which covered more than one fourth of the total number of wage-earners engaged in mining and manufacturing. An inquiry of this magnitude may be accepted as a fair sample of conditions in industry at large. It showed that only 9.3 percent of employees are dealing with employers through trade unions, while 45.7 percent are bargaining on an individual basis and 45 percent are enlisted in company unions. Less than 14 percent of the employers embraced by the study are recognizing trade unions.

HAMPERING CONDITIONS

It is worthy of note that company unions are most prevalent in the largest plants. This means that in the very cases where the bargaining power of the umployer is strongest, the worker is least free to improve his own position by enhampered affiliation with others of his kind.

It is also true that these unions have multiplied most rapidly since the enactment of the law which was intended to guarantee to the worker the fullest freedom of organization. The number of employees covered by company unions rose from 432,000 in 1932 to 1,164,000 in 1933, representing a gain of 169 percent. More than 69 percent of the company-union schemes now in existence have been inaugurated in the brief period since the passage of the Recovery Act.

The company union, as I have defined it, runs antithetical to the very core of the "new deal" philosophy. Business men are being allowed to pool their information and experience in vast trade associations in order to make a concerted drive against the evil features of modern industrialism. They have been permitted to reorganize the values of unity and the destructive tendencies of discrete activities, and to act accordingly. If employees are denied similar privileges they not only are unable to uphold their end of the labor bargain, in addition they cannot cope with any problems that transcend the boundaries of a single business.

BENEFITS AND FAILINGS

The company union has improved personal relations, group welfare activities, discipline, and the other matters which may be handled on a local basis. But it has failed dismally to standardize or improve wage levels, for the wage question is a general one whose sweep embraces whole industries, or States, or even the Nation. Without wider areas of cooperation among employees that can be no protection against the nibbling tactics of the unfair employer or of the worker who is willing to degrade standards by serving for a pittance.

The inability of employees to unit in larger groups has not only limited their efforts to secure a just share of the national wealth. It has interfered with their attempts to provide insurance against sickness and old age, and to exert an effective influence upon salutary labor legislation. It has hampered the efforts of labor to preserve order within its own ranks, or to restrain the untimely and wayward acts of irresponsible groups, In this latter aspect, its unfavorable effect upon employers as well as workers stands clearly forth.

Even when dealing with problems that may without injury be delimited to the single company, the worker under company unionism suffers two fatal handicaps. In the first place, he has only slight knowledge of the labor market or of general business conditions. His trade is tending a machine. If forbidden to hire an expert in industrial relationships, he is entirely ineffectual in his attempts to take advantage of legitimate opportunities.

Secondly, only representatives who are not subservient to the employer with whom they deal can act freely in the interest of employees. Simple common sense tells us that a man does not possess this freedom when he bargain with those who control his source of livelihood.

I am well aware that many employer-dominated organizations now permit their employees to choose outside representatives, and the National Labor Board has affirmed this policy in a recent case. But this right is a mockery when the presence of a company union firmly entrenched in a plant enables an employer to exercise a compelling force over the collective activities of his workers. Freedom must begin with the removal of obstacles to its exercise.

MAJOR QUESTIONS INVOLVED

Major questions of self-expression and democracy are involved. At a time when politics is becoming impersonalized and when the average worker is remote from the processes of government, it is more imperative than ever before that industry should afford him real opportunities to participate in the determination of economic issues.

The company union is generally initiated by the employer; it exists by his sufferance; its decisions are subject to his unimpeachable veto. Most impartial students of industrial problems agree that the highest degree of cooperation between industry and labor is possible only when either side is free to act or to withdraw, and that the best records of mutual respect and mutual accomplishment have been made by employers dealing with independent labor organizations.

THE COMPANY'S CASE

The principal argument advanced by the proponents of company unionism is that it promotes industrial harmony and peace without subjecting the individual company to the intrusion of outside labor groups who have no interest in the company's practices. Of course, in our complicated economy, the interests of all employers and all employees are inextricably intertwined, and the assumption that outside workers have no valid interest in the labor standards prevailing within a plant is demonstrably false. Besides, a tranquil relationship between employer and employee, while eminently desirable, is not a sole desideratum. It all depends upon the basis of tranquility. The slave system of the old South was as tranquil as a summer's day, but that is no reason for perpetuating in modern industry any of the aspects of a master-servant relationship.

As a matter of fact, the company union cannot sustain even the claim that it tends to insure industrial peace. Men versed in the tenets of freedom become restive when not allowed to be free. The sharp outbreaks of economic warfare in various parts of the country at the present time have been caused more by the failure of employers to observe the spirit of section 7 (a) of the recovery act than by any other single factor. It has been my observation that industrial strife is most violent when company unionism enters into the situation, and that the company union line of organization is least likely to bring forth the restraint of irresponsible employees by others of their own group.

The implications of what I have just said are clear. If the employer-dominated union is not checked, there are only two likely results. One is that the employer will have to maintain his dominance by force, and thus swing us directly into industrial fascism and the destruction of our most-cherished American ideals; the other is that employees will revolt, with widespread violence and unpredictable conclusions.

The final argument advanced for company unionism is that it hould be allowed to compete against trade unionism in an open field. If by company unionism one means simply the right of employees to confine their activitie to a single employer unit when they wish to do so, I do not object to that principle in the slightest and there is nothing contrary to it in the bill which I have introduced. But if by company unionism one includes the right of employers to obstruct the development of a more widespread employee cooperation, such a policy cannot be allowed to continue if we intend to pursue the philosophy of the new era.

THE NEW BILL

The new bill forbids any employer to influence any organization which deals with problems such as wages, grievances, and hours. They should be covered by a genuine labor union. At the same time, the bill does not prevent employers from forming or assisting associations which exist to promote the health and general welfare of workers or to provide group insurance, or for similar purposes. Employer-controlled organizations should be allowed to serve their proper functions of supplementing trade unionism, but they should not be allowed to supplant or destroy it.

Failure to meet the company-union challenge has not been the only defect of section 7 (a) of the recovery act. This section provides that employees shall be free to choose their own representatives. It has been interpreted repeatedly to mean that any employee at any time may elect to deal individually with his employer, even if the overwhelming majority of his coworkers desire a collective agreement covering all. Such an interpretation is detrimental to the practice and contrary to the theory of collective bargaining. It permits an unscrupulous employer to divide his employee against themselves by dealing with innumerable small groups or with individuals.

In my opinion, Congress certainly did not intend that the law should operate to place employees in a more unfavorable position than they were before the Recovery Act was passed.

The proposed legislation does not resolve the question of the closed-union shop. Such issues should be worked out by labor and industry in the course of experience. But the bill, if enacted, would make it clear that Congress has not intended to forclose the issue by illegalizing the closed-union shop or by placing any other obstacles in the way of making collective bargaining a working reality.

QUESTION OF RECOGNITION

The third major defect of section 7 (a) is that, while it guarantees to employees the right to organize, it does not state explicitly the right to receive recognition through their representatives. This explains why company unionism has increased so rapidly despite the fact that other labor organizations have added 2,000,000 to their membership during the past year. Employees have been assured of their right to join whatever unions they prefer, but they have been forced to bargain either individually or through company unions.

This refusal of employers to deal with properly chosen representatives has been the cause of more than 70 percent of the disputes coming before the National Labor Board. The new bill is designed to remedy this evil. It is modeled upon the successful experience of the Railway Labor Act, which provides that employers shall actually recognize duly chosen representatives and make a reasonable effort to deal with them and to reach satisfactory collective agreements.

ATTITUDE OF EMPLOYERS

When the factual situation that confronts us is analyzed carefully and comprehended fully, I am sure that employers as well as employees will favor the proposed measure. Fair-minded employers who are now allowed to band together in huge trade associations do not desire to deny analogous rights to their workers. Fair-minded employers do not relish the pretense that industry and labor are upon an equal footing, when in fact industry controls both sides by dominating the strategic points in the areas of controversy.

Most important of all, far-sighted and broad-visioned employers who recognize the certainty of economic discord and the threat to our entire economic program that is implicit in the present status of labor relations will join whole-heartedly in this proposal for improvement.

There always will be an unfair minority who are amendable only to coercion. For this reason the National Labor Board, under the new bill, would be vested with statutory sanctions and given actual powers of investigation and restraint similar to those exercised by the Federal Trade Commission in cases of unfair competition. It would be composed of seven members, including two representatives of employers, two of employees, and three of the general public, and it would be empowered to set up regional or local boards.

FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD

The present National Labor Board, set up by Executive order, has carried on its activities for half a year. In that short time, it has helped 650,000 employees, who were engaged in disputes, to return to work or to remain at work, upon terms satisfactory to all interested parties and promising durable peace. The chief function of the new board would not be to act as policeman or judge, but to mediate and conciliate industrial disputes, and to offer its services as arbitrator when the parties so desired. Aside from its power to prevent the specific unfair practices that would be forbidden by the law, it would not have the slightest flavor or compulsion. It would have no kinship to compulsory arbitration. It would continue to promote peace rather than strife and to appeal to the better judgment and good intentions of industry and labor.

When this board is established and bolstered by adequate sanctions and a clarification of the substantive law, it will help to solve the thorniest problem confronting us today, and be one of the chief bulwarks of our future economic prosperity and social justice.

The CHAIRMAN. Mrs. Herrick, will you tell us of your activities?

Mrs. HERRICK. I have been acting chairman of the regional labor board, and that board has handled, as a regional board, over 500 strikes, and as a mediation committee of the N.R.A. has handled 185 strikes, and came into this work with a viewpoint of both the worker and the employer. I worked for some years as a peace worker in factories, and later, for approximately 6 years, I was a productive manager for the Du Pont Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. I assure you your paper will be read by all the members of the committee, and it will get more attention from them.

Mrs. HERRICK. I have come here today to speak in behalf of Senator Wagner's bill giving statutory powers to the National Labor Board because I am convinced, out of an intensive and extensive experience as head of the New York Regional Labor Board, that only through such machinery can the purposes of the Recovery Act to raise purchasing power and shorten hours be effectuated.

When the Recovery Act was written, the need had been demonstrated for the establishment of some method by which labor—which, after all, is both producer and consumer—could secure an equitable share of the national income, or, stating it in another way, an equitable share of its product. Only by such equitable distribution of the national wealth can this country avoid another complete collapse of the industrial system.

Although the writers of the National Industrial Recovery Act wrote section 7 (a) into the law of the land, I am confident they did not see as clearly then as now that organization for collective bargaining by labor would be the most effective and cheapest instrumentality for securing that equitable distribution of wealth. No one could foresee the trend that codification of industry would take, namely, the strengthening of industrial control of fair-trade practices with all that is implied therein. This concentration of power in the hands of industry has, so far as my observations go, far outstripped the strengthening of labor's power. The National Industrial Recovery program was to have been a cooperative enterprise between employers and employees. Yet, in a substantial part of the industrial system, that hoped-for cooperation has not been achieved.

We have fallen away from the high purposes and aims of the Recovery Act, through the nibbling away by selfish interests, which have written weak provisions into codes allowing ample opportunity for evasion by self-governing industry and have written inhumanly low wage rates into these codes. The Wagner bill is essentially aimed to permit the correction of such abuses by strengthening the position of labor in collective bargaining.

I am convinced that the entire Recovery program stands or falls on the labor provisions, and the reality of opportunity given to labor to bargain collectively. We must face the fact that the Government has fallen short of the success it anticipated in raising wages and reemploying the millions who have so long lacked work. A large measure of responsibility for our incomplete realization of this goal must be borne by those employers who are thwarting labor's right to organize for collective bargaining.

Many of the strikes handled by the regional labor board have been a protest against violations of codes by employers, or an effort to secure something more than the pitiful minimum wages set in the codes. When the process of code making was in the early stages the Government took the position, and rightly, that the codes should fix only that bottom level below which employers might not pay their labor. The Government relied upon section 7 (a) and the organization of workers for collective bargaining to fix wages in the more skilled occupations and in the higher brackets. Instead, what do we find? The minimum is made the maximum in virtually all hitherto unorganized trades and in many of the organized trades. In many instances learners' rates are paid to skilled workers, who are first discharged and then rehired at the "learner" or the minimum rate.

It is not enough that employers should merely refrain from violating the minimum wage and maximum hour provisions of the codes. Employers must also refrain from hampering labor in its efforts to organize, as only through such collective action by labor can the necessary corrective steps be taken toward the building up of an equitable adjustment between employers and employees.

As Senator Wagner said before the national convention of code authorities on March 5, "There must be, above all, cooperation between employers and employees, dealing with one another on an equal footing." Section 7 (a) was designed to put these two groups on an equal footing, yet we find in practice that there is no equal footing. The employer can, and many employers do, dominate the workers by discriminatory practices of various kinds, despite section 7 (a). In the New York region alone, where we have a cross-section of every type of industry, we have brought about the reinstatement of over 2,000 individuals who hae been singled out because of their union activities, and have been fired summarily, immediately after attending a union meeting, although the employers never admitted that there was any correlation.

But I do not want to talk in general terms. It seemed to me that out of the experience of the New York Regional Board I could bring to you some really first-hand information as to the difficulties and weaknesses of the present set-up of the labor boards, and some examples to show how vitally necessary it is that the powers of the National Labor Board be greatly strengthened in the interest of industrial recovery and as a protection to those far-sighted employers who are making an honest effort to help recovery.

I propose, therefore, to take Senator Wagner's bill section by section and tell you briefly the type of problem we have met which that particular section is designed to remedy.

Section 5 (2) declares it to be an—unfair labor practice to refuse to recognize or deal with representatives of his employers or to fail to make a reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

Last August a certain clothing firm signed an agreement with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, local 178. November 16 the shop closed and workers were told that operations would recommence as soon as possible. Meanwhile the firm reorganized, and claims that 4 of the 13 former employees became partners in the business, although they put up no capital, and, in fact, during the shut-down were receiving public aid. The only change in reality was that an "Incorporated" was added to the firm's name, and 9 employees are out in the cold with a broken union contract. The four who are now working as "partners" are exceeding code hours and union hours, and sharing the so-called "profits", although at a hearing it was established that the share money was actually far less than the union scale of wages. The nine workers with whom the firm broke its contract are receiving public aid. This employer is competing unfairly with stabilized firms in the clothing trade in New York.

The Labor Board held that this was a subterfuge to evade an obligation no less to the union but also to the Recovery Administration. However, the Board could only report the situation to the code authority, which promised on January 19 to investigate. Since then, a dead silence from this particular code authority.

This is not an isolated case. I could recite almost identical details from a number of other cases.

A firm in an entirely different line of business used a somewhat different method of achieving the same purpose of lowering wages. They locked out all thier employees because the union refused to allow its members to accept postdated checks in payment of wages, which, incidentally, was in violation of State law as well as union agreements.

Or there is the well-known restaurant which owed back wages for 9 weeks to 6 men and owed the remainder of their employees from 2 to 4 weeks' wages. In this case the employer, as soon as the workers asked for their pay, fired all those workers to whom money was due.

Changing the name and address of a firm is a device frequently used to evade workers who strike in protest against a cut in wages below the union scale. These are all actions over which the labor board has no control and even under the new set-up proposed, the Board will have no control. But these things would not occur if the bargaining power of the workers in any way equalled the bargaining powers of employers.

In such cases as that involving the entire optical-manufacturing industry in New York in which the workers had struck 100 percent for the right of collective bargaining and recognition of union representation, it became apparent during the course of negotiations that the employers at no time entered the conferences with the intent of coming to any sort of agreement with their employees. They refused even to submit to arbitration, although the union offered to do so. In such a situation there must be some final authority given to an impartial Government agency to step in and compel an equitable settlement. If only in the public interest, such a situation cannot be allowed to drag along until either one or both parties to the dispute are exhausted.

I need not inform the committee of the many instances in which the employers hamper the workers in their self-organization through practices which section 5 (3) of the bill is designed to eliminate.

In the Fifth Avenue Coach Co. case, a petition for election was signed by 150 workers. Yet on the day of the election only 12 workers showed up to vote. It is a fair inference to state that the presence of cars containing company agents and officials parked near the polling places had something to do with the failure to vote by 138 of the workers who signed the petition.

Incidentally, the presence of these cars caused my young son to ask: "Isn't this the first time employers have gone in for 'mass picketing', Mother?"

In the Ever-Ready Label Corporation, "the country's largest printers of N.R.A. labels", according to the company's paid advertising, an election for representatives for collective bargaining was held under the supervision of the employer, and resulted in what the employer characterized as an "overwhelming pledge of loyalty." When, 2 weeks later, the unions having members in the shop called a strike in protest against this election and against wages lower than code minima, and a violation of the learners' rates, the employer appeared before the Regional Labor Board and stated, "I am here to represent my employees."

The employer had some justification for thinking that, if the employees chose a company union, they wanted him to represent them in collective bargaining with himself. The mere statement of this proposition shows how ridiculous such a method of collective bargaining must inevitably be. Of course, most proponents of "company dominated" unions do not admit that in effect this is the type of collective bargaining that is engendered by a "company dominated" union. This particular employer was more frank, or possibly had a clearer vision of the inevitable result of such a set-up as far as collective bargaining is concerned.

Or take the case of a radio company. Directly after a meeting to organize the union, the plant was closed, ostensibly for inventory purposes, but when it reopened, the union leaders were frozen out. Almost immediately, the employer called a meeting of the employees, stationed police in the hall, and then made a speech urging a company union on the workers. He still claims complete ignorance as to why he has had such a troublesome labor situation on his hands ever since.

All such attempts by employers to dominate workers' organizations lead inevitably, sooner or later, to dissension and strikes; and in the meanwhile, in every instance, the employers complain bitterly of the inefficiency of the workers and their indifference to the management's problems. There is such a strange naivete and little boy faith in miracles that prevents these employers from having any realistic conception of how they injure irreparably their own interests when they force their will upon workers who are well aware that the law gives them freedom of choice to select any representatives they want.

Section 5 (6) declares it an "unfair labor practice" to engage in discriminatory practices as to wage or hour differentials, advancement, demotion, hire, tenure of employment, or any other condition of employment which discourages union membership. This shall not preclude a "closed shop" agreement, if no unfair influence is used, if the organization represents a majority of workers and if agreements last for no more than a year.

We had, in the Fifth Avenue Coach Co. case, a complaint on the dismissal of 19 men, every one an official of the union. Some of them had been in the employ of the company for as long as 17 years; they were all discharged within a very few weeks after attending a union meeting. Some of them became suddenly inefficient and "endangered the lives of the public" within the short space of 10 blocks, and managed somehow to break 15 or 20 company rules within a 10 block drive, such as "failing to help an old lady board the bus!"

Is it surprising that reasonable people assumed that the direct cause of these dismissals was the men's activity in union organization?

Instances such as this can be multiplied by the hundred, despite the fact that section 7 (a) has attempted to prevent such practices.

Frequently employers require workers to sign pledges similar to the following:

> To management of Cushman's Sons, Inc., 518 East Seventy-second Street, New York.
> In view of the fact that there has been considerable discussion in regard to the present working conditions of bakery employees in this city, I wish to advise you that notwithstanding my membership in the proposed union for bakery employees, my first concern is loyalty to the Cushman's Bakery organization and my fellow employees, and under no circumstances am I willing to subscribe to a strike, lockout, or any other forceful means to accomplish the establishment of a closed shop.
> I wish to pledge my loyalty to you and the Cushman's Bakery executives, believing in the assurance given us that we can accomplish our aims by collective bargaining within our own bakery organization and without the aid of anyone not employed by the company.

In this instance, the employees alleged that they were required to sign this statement as they got their pay checks, and were told by the foremen that "if they knew what was good for them" they would sign.

Less subtle is the method of telling an employee, "You are fired because you joined the union. Just tell the other workers what you got. Now let the union find a job for you." This has happened so often that it is hardly worthy of mention by name of case.

Section 204 (a) gives the board "power to make public the findings and results in any case in which it acts as conciliator or mediator." Where there is no violation of law and either side takes an arbitrary or unjust stand it is only fair that the public should know the facts. In a number of cases we have found that when the facts were thus presented to the public, the power of public opinion has been sufficient to cause the arbitrary party to modify his stand.

Of course, publicity is not sufficient to correct all the abuses which arise. It is of value, however, where either party arbitrarily refuses to mediate even though the stand the party takes may be prejudicial to the public interest. But this use of publicity alone is certainly not sufficient to satisfy the need for specific provisions of the Wagner bill outlawing definite practices. This particularly applies to small "marginal" firms, which are an ever-present threat to stabilized concerns and yet are not susceptible to this publicity treatment. A "stick" in the paper is no deterrent; it has to be headline news to make a firm really comply.

The attitude of such "marginal" firms is well described in a letter from an employee of the Louis Towbin Co., manufacturers of mattresses. I want to read a part of this employee's letter, because his words are more eloquent than mine could possibly be:

REGIONAL LABOR BOARD, N.R.A.,
45 Broadway, New York City.

LADIES, GENTLEMEN: The bedding industry of Greater New York are watching with much interest the action of the N.R.A. in this case. Fair employers and employees, with wonder at the delay and injustice inflicted on the worker. Chiseling employers watch with glee and feel stronger in their chiseling efforts. Workers are fearful of selecting a representative, as they see this long-drawn-out example of N.R.A. enforcement. As we all know, this firm has, over a period of 6 months, defied all efforts of the regional board to effect a settlement or force compliance of this national law. On January 31, the firm did enter into negotiations with employees and did sign an agreement. This, it shows, was done to stall off action of the National Labor Board, to whom this case had been referred for action. This agreement was violated on February 2, the firm showing that it had no intention of living up to it, and has continued the violations of the code and a defiance of the National Recovery Act.

These employees, discharged for accepting the invitation of the Government to select a representative, have suffered in silence, with the hope and confidence that the Government, which had enccuraged them to take this action, would not desert them.

It must be abundantly clear to all of you that machinery must be provided for legally compelling compliance with the National Recovery Act. The Wagner Labor Disputes Act gives us this sorely needed strength.

Sections 205 and 208 in essence give the board "power to issue complaints and compel attendance, relieves the board from being bound by rules of evidence as in courts of law, and gives the board power to subpena witnesses."

In many cases, even though employers are under a code, they refuse to come before the board. It is obviously impossible to attempt an adjustment of the dispute if one of the parties refuses to appear or to confer.

The provision that the "board shall not be bound by rules of evidence as in courts of law" has a special significance for one who has been serving on a labor board.

An alleged injustice, rankling to the workers, necessitates the coming together of both parties. Such a feeling of injustice has its roots in a problem of human relationships. Sunlight and fresh air are the best therapeutics for this kind of disease, just as for physical ailments. Rules of evidence and technical points of law have no place in hearings on an industrial dispute, because they are raised only to befog the issue, to cut off the sunlight and air of open, frank discussion.

Many employers persist in raising legal objections as though in a court of law; they make their "appearance" not in person, but through counsel which cannot and does not have any first-hand knowledge of the underlying causes of the disputes. By tactics of delay and objections, counsel representing several important meat packers in New York, has successfully delayed the board in adjustment of a number of disputes, has kept workers unemployed, and in essence, this lawyer, actively engaged in defeating labor's right to representatives of their own choosing, continues to insist on his right to represent employers whom this board has never yet had the privilege of meeting face to face.

I could go on with this bill, section by section, and cite an ever-mounting roll of cases to point the necessity for the Wagner bill, but time does not permit. We come now to the heart of the Wagner bill: those sections giving compulsory power to the board to enforce its findings or orders. The right given the board to go to any district court in the district where the labor practice in question was engaged in should materially expedite the handling of cases and should ensure enforcement.

The present methods of enforcing compliance with section 7 (a) are undignified and unfair. Unfair, because the little fellow is so apt to be hurt by publicity and the very big fellow is not hurt enough. It is really the "middle-sized bear" that feels the lash of public scorn. Our present methods of enforcing compliance are undignified and unworthy of Government agents. We must put the Labor Board on a firm, solid foundation. Implement it for effective speedy action.

I can envisage now, and I wish I could show you the file of depressed and bewildered workers who pass through the New York offices of the Regional Labor Board day after day, saying, "But you told the boss to take us back, and he has not done it; can't you make him give us back our jobs? We didn't do anything wrong in joining the union, did we? Didn't Congress and the President give us the right to join any union we wanted?"

Free Americans, of course they were within their rights; but might is still right in industrial disputes, and the workers are still at a disadvantage. It takes a tremendous amount of collective action by workers to even approach equality in bargaining power with an employer, even a single employer, let alone a Nation-wide corporation. If the employers of the country know that labor board decrees can be enforced by the courts, we shall see a "right about face" on the part of the many who still defy the Government's desire to settle industrial disputes by peaceful and conciliatory means.

The workers do not realize the present limitations upon the labor board. As a result, they have become embittered against the whole Government program. This attitude is clearly expressed in a letter which came to me just this week:

DEAR MRS. HERRICK: Now or ever you and your party got to stand your bluff. You have made several statements about the N.R.A. and what can and can't be done under the law. You claim Roosevelt, Johnson, Wagner, yourself, etc. can do and undo miracles under section 7 (a) of the N.I.R.A. Now your bluffing is called by Mr. Wood, president of the Fifth Avenue Coach Co., who has said the whole thing is a stupid, unfounded, misleading, un-American stupidity. He has defied both you and everyone up to the President of the United States. Oh, what a fine challenge. Don't you know the eyes of New York and the whole Nation are on this case? I understand you have fine material from employees for a case against those people, but have you any law or anybody to enforce it, don't they know of the transit code? What influence through Grover Whalen or whom, or is it plain graft again? Why are not Fifth Avenue Coach Co. and all of the other transit companies made to live up to the transit code? Why can they defy it by working employees long hours as always—ticket agents on the Interborough Rapid Transit are still working 10 hours a day and dispatchers and supervisors on the Bus Co. 70 hours a week while others are starving. And Johnson and Roosevelt are, by the way, crying for shorter hours and higher pay.

Do those men, Wagner included with Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, think the people can be fooled forever? Labor has its part done and will do no more until those 25 men of the Bus Co. are reinstated, a speedy trial is needed to retain confidence. You have the evidence for a conviction under the law and if you don't act and act quickly then I would suggest to have Mr. Wood, president of the Fifth Avenue Coach Co., go down to Washington and replace Roosevelt in the White House and you, Wagner, and Johnson get Jimmy Walker's bronx cheer.

Not a pretty letter to receive, but, unfortunately, indicative of the distrust the public is beginning to feel in the sincerety of the Government.

One of the major difficulties now is that due to our lack of power cases drag on and on, and the employer all too successfully engages in a war of attrition. This is no help to the recovery program, when as a result factories stay closed for weeks and even months, and workers, when strike benefits are exhausted must knuckle under or ask for charity relief.

While the labor board must be given enforcement power, I think it only fair to point out that those of us who are dealing with these labor disputes day after day realize to the full our responsibility to educate and train both employers and employees in a realization of their several responsibilities. It has been a source of gratification to the New York Regional Labor Board to maintain a continuing communication with a number of firms and groups of workers that have come before us for an adjudication of their labor disputes. I frequently find myself back again in the role of a production manager, as in the case of the Whelan Studios, a coast to coast network of photographic studios.

Since reaching a strike settlement through the agency of the New York board this firm has consulted us on numerous occasions on both personnel and production problems. Similarly a newly formed union has taken us into their confidence frequently and sought advice in advance of taking any drastic action, thereby enabling us to stave off many unecessary and costly struggles. Yesterday the president of a chain of hotels submitted to me for cirticism a series of bulletins he proposed issuing to his executive officers in explanation of certain problems that had arisen under section 7 (a).

I point these things out only to show that if public confidence in the labor board can be strengthened and maintained we shall be in an increasingly better position to render a service to the country which never appears in the records of the National Labor Board as "strikes settled."

The present equivocal status of the labor board, however, seriously impairs, if, indeed, it has not already destroyed our power for effective action because of the loss of public confidence. The Labor Board has a contribution to make to industrial stability, if it is given the requisite power to enforce its decisions where it is impossible to mediate disputes.

The necessity of building a firm structure for securing permanent industrial justice and peace must be apparent. I come straight from the "firing line" to try to show you some of the forces that render urgent and imperative the passage of the Wagner Labor Disputes Act. We are engaged today, not alone in a fight and struggle to win our way back to prosperity, however we may severally define "prosperity", but I see in the Wagner bill a long-range program to secure an enduring and above all practical basis for industrial peace.

Unless we can work out rules of the game that apply equitably to both employers and labor, we are faced with increasing violence and increasing industrial strife, caused by the failure of the Government to back up section 7 (a). If we do not put the labor board on such a basis as the Wagner bill establishes, I believe that we face a total collapse of the present economic system. Implement section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act by passing the labor disputes bill. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Will Mr. Mullenbach come forward?

STATEMENT OF JAMES MULLENBACH, CHICAGO ARBITRATOR, CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give us your full name for the record Mr. Mullenbach?

Mr. MULLENBACH. James Mullenbach, 855 Drexel Square, Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. Your occupation and business.

Mr. MULLENBACH. I am arbitrator for the clothing trades, particularly for Hart, Schaeffner & Marx, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, of Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been engaged as arbitrator?

Mr. MULLENBACH. It will be 22 years in May since we had our first hearing. I am also connected as a representative of the National Labor Board since August, until the first of the year; since that time I have been a member of the Petroleum Labor Policy Board in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. We would like very much to have your views on this bill.

Mr. MULLENBACH. I should like at the outset to distinguish between the official relationship, as a member of this Board, and my personal opinion. I think we all understand that, as the representative of the regional labor board in Chicago at times, or as a member of the Federal Labor Board, I am restricted and limited strictly by the terms of that act, that when the people select their representatives, those representatives are either A. F. of L. men, whether they are independent union, whether they choose to organize under an employees' representative plan, so far as it is on their own initiative and of their own will, I am required as a representative of the Board to recognize the union, no matter what I might think about a company union as such.

Now, I would like to say a word or two, in order to be brief, on certain points of this bill, points that I believe would help in the clarification and the enforcement of section 7 (a) which I think would be more to the point. I could go into a very elaborate discussion here as to why I think this bill is an attack upon the final citadel of democracy and our social order and our country, which it is, but I do not want to go into that, into a long discourse, why it is that they resort to devious devices by company unions in order to retain their power.

The CHAIRMAN. You might send us a statement for the record of your views. They will be put into the record.

Mr. MULLENBACH. I would like to do that, if that would be satisfactory to you.

First, with regard to the composition of the Board, my suggestion there is that the representatives of the public—the three representatives of the public—be given sole voting power in the Board. I think it is well to have these 3 representatives, and the 2 representatives of capital and labor on the Board, but these representatives of capital and labor I would have in purely an advisory relationship. It is my observation during these years as an arbitrator and mediator that it is very difficult sometimes for an arbitrator to make a decision that is entirely satisfactory to both sides. I can conceive of situations arising where it would be quite impossible for the three members of the Board to secure the consent of both sides to a decision that they believe to be valid and proper.

To speak of my experience in the regional labor board in Chicago, we had a case which was before your National Labor Board, the case of A. Roth, which is a small concern. In that case the employer had to be summoned three times before the regional labor board before he was finally persuaded to appear by one of the representatives of his own kind, a representative of the Manufacturers' Association that sits upon our Board. Not until that persuasion was used did he appear before our Board, and when he appeared there, in response to a question by the chairman, President Hutchins of the Univeristy of Chicago, who asked him if he were prepared to observe the regulation of 7 (a)——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. Could you come back this afternoon?

Mr. MULLENBACH. Yes; I could come back this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sure your presentation will be most helpful and very interesting. I do not like to press you, but we will have to finish very soon. Now may I suggest that you and the other witnesses, those who desire to be heard, that they return to the committee room at 2:30 this afternoon.

(Whereupon a recess was taken, at the hour of 1:00 p.m., until 2:30 p.m., of the same afternoon, Thursday, March 16, 1934.)

AFTER RECESS

(The hearing was resumed at 2:30 p.m.)

The CHAIRMAN. I must apologize for being late. I should not have agreed to come back at all this afternoon because I knew I had an engagement that would keep me quite a long time, but I thought I would try to find an opportunity to hear some of this evidence, especially those who could not be here next Tuesday. I understand Mr. Chipman is anxious to get a hearing and that Mr. Mullenbach is willing to have Mr. Chipman take his place.

Mr. MULLENBACH. Dr. Lapp.

STATEMENT OF DR. JOHN A. LAPP

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Lapp, what is your full name?

Dr. LAPP. Dr. John A. Lapp.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence, for the record?

Dr. LAPP. Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. What have been some of your activities?

Dr. LAPP. Chairman of the bituminous coal labor board of division 2; member of the National Bituminous Coal Labor Board; for several weeks last fall at the beginning directing the Chicago Regional Labor Board, and associated rather closely with that organization since that time; at the present time engaged entirely in the work of the bituminous coal labor board, division 2, which includes the State of Indiana, the State of Iowa, and the very peaceful State of Illinois.

I do not intend to go into the question of collective bargaining because that has been presented to this Board fully by a number of witnesses. I will pass that up.

Yesterday this article by Senator Wagner was proposed and one of the witnesses said he would present it, the one that appeared last Sunday, on company unions. Lest he does not present it, I will leave it here with the committee because I think it is one of the most excellent statements of the principles of collective bargaining, and also one of the best expositions of the company union.

(The newspaper article referred to by the witness is attached as an exhibit.)

Dr. LAPP. In the first place, I am not speaking in behalf of the rightness of collective bargaining because in my judgment only extreme Bourbons oppose collective bargaining. It is quite inconceivable to be that anyone should hold that workers have not the right to act in unison. It is an elemental right of man to do that, and it seems to me like a travesty that we are here discussing before a Senate committee and that the Senate committee and the Senators take time necessarily in consideration of a question that is settled by plain, ordinary principles of right, that men have the same right to organize as workers that industrialists have to organize as industrialists. Now, the industry from which I come as a representative is fully organized in three States. There are only 2 or 3 company unions in all of Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa in the coal industry, and there are only a few, and very small mines at that, that are organized.

Moreover, these mines have been organized for many years and I have yet to find any leader of industry who would go back to the anarchy of the old days. I doubt if you would find any leaders in the three States who would think of giving up collective bargaining as it has been developed in those three States in the coal industry.

The coal code under which we work goes farther even than section 7 (a) and even goes farther than the proposed bill. I would like to read the section of the coal code to show how far this matter extends:

SEC. 5. Labor relations.—(a) Any controversy concerning hours, wages, and conditions of employment, or compliance with the provisions of article V of this code—that is the labor provisions—

between employers and employees who are organized or associated for collective action shall, if possible, be adjusted by conference and negotiation between duly designated representatives of employers and such employees, meeting either in a mine conference or district conference or divisional conference, as the machinery for such conference may be established by agreement of the parties thereto; and it shall be the duty of employers and employees to exert every reasonable effort to establish such machinery of adjustment and to utilize it to negotiate to a conclusion such controversies wherever possible.

In other words, in our industry, the code calls for both employers and employees to get organized in order that they may settle disputes with the machinery thus set forth, and the Bituminous Coal Labor Board is given jurisdiction to see that that is done, and in some instances, the Board has definitely ordered the representatives of small mines to get organized in order that they might settle their own disputes, we realizing that if they settle their own disputes this Board as a governmental body will have comparatively little to do.

I am very much agreed on this bill. It is an excellent bill. There are a few details in it that one might question but they are not the important provisions of the bill.

It removes the obstructions to industrial peace. It removes the main causes of industrial war. It does this by stopping the causes at their very source; it does not stop strikes, nothing can do that completely, but it does lessen or will be bound to lessen their occurrence.

I emphasize again that it is a preventive measure.

Experience as we have had it in the regional labor boards and elsewhere shows that representatives of workers for collective bargaining must be absolutely free and no company union represented can be free to be an agent in collective bargaining, it just is not possible for a man who represents a company union, dependent upon a company, to be a representative in collective bargaining.

Representatives of company unions are not free, because, as you heard this morning, and as you heard yesterday, they are under the domination and the influence of the employers, and to have a collective bargaining arrangement or a contract between a company union and the company is absurd. No man can contract with himself. No one department of a business can contract with another department of business, and the company union is nothing short of a department of the business contracting with another part of the business.

I should like to emphasize what others have emphasized here throughout these hearings, that there is no collective bargaining arrangement in force anywhere, nor to my knowledge has one ever been made, where wages, hours, and the really vital conditions of work have been the object of negotiations between company union representatives and the employers.

As a rule also the men in a plant, the men who work in the plant, are not able to and willing to stand up in the face of their employer as the representative of their fellow employees. I think that is extremely important to emphasize although it is a matter well known to all who have had connection with labor unions. An employee who faces his employer is timid, even though he has a group back of him. I have been in groups where employers have met employees and the first thing that struck me was the timidity of the men when they faced their employer. The result is that it is necessary for employees to have outside representatives if they are really going to be free in the bargaining which they are to have with their employer. That is why it is so essential that the men have free choice to pick men either within their own group or outside of their own group, men who work in this plant, or men who come from outside, as representatives of labor unions if there is to be that kind of freedom which is so essential in the development of real bargaining.

Now, the next matter which has come from my experience is this matter of what is collective bargaining. Meeting the employees is one thing and bargaining is quite another thing. We have had ever so many instances—not in the coal business, because that is organized—but in the other lines of industry where men have said, "Yes, I will meet my men; I have always been willing to meet my men; I will meet a committee of my men at any time—" but they have added, "I will not agree with them, I will not bargain with them, I will not do as they ask me to." In other words, in advance agreeing that they will disagree on anything that is proposed by the employees.

I had that within the last few weeks while I was sitting on a committee with one of the leading employers of our section of the country, a man employing some 4,000 men. He said very frankly, "We agreed to meet our men but we did not agree to do anything about it, but we will always meet them." His conclusion was that there was nothing that was certain to come out of it.

Now, it is essential that we have some means by which men who are required to have collective bargaining go beyond the mere meeting and discussion, and the bill does specifically provide that they must observe every reasonable effort to bring about collective bargaining. That is to my mind the most essential fact, and the machinery set up in this bill will have its main duty in seeing to it that that bargain is actually made or that every reasonable effort is exerted to make that bargain.

Of course, the weakness that we have all discovered has been in the enforcement of section 7 (a). I do not want to go into that because it has been discussed here so much, but this is evident to all that section 7 (a) in its present form has not been enforcible to the degree that has been necessary to bring about results that have been desired.

This bill remedies that weakness. This bill puts teeth into section 7 (a) and makes certain that the workers shall have a free right to organize into the kind of unions they desire and that they shall not be coerced into company unions.

It is particularly important to note what has been noted so frequently, that the employer is taken out of the business completely of having anything to do with the organizing of workers, and my judgment is that he cannot have anything to do with the organizing of workers without actually coercing them for his very presence is a coercive thing with employees.

There is one matter that has not been touched upon, at least while I have been present at this hearing, that this bill does provide a very adequate machinery for court review. No man can claim that anything is being put over on him arbitrarily by this bill if he can go into court, the provisions being very specific, and have that decision, if it affects him vitally, reviewed by the court. There is also a very fine protective feature in that provision, namely, that if he goes into court and advances new testimony, the matter is automatically referred back to the board in order that the board can take into consideration all new testimony.

It has happened so frequently in public utility hearings that the boards have been made jokes of because they would present only part of the case to the board and then later go into court and present their full case and the board would be a laughing stock because it was overruled. This provides that new testimony must go back to the board and be heard by the board.

Then, finally, there is the provision regarding attendance of people whom we want to hear. The regional boards and the national boards, too, have had the difficulty of forcing men to come in, and it has been very humiliating to public officials to send out a notice to men under the authority of the Government of the United States and have some little whipper-snapper of an employer—usually the smaller they are the more they do it—refuse to come in even to be heard in the case. Consequently, in that connection it is very important that we have a right to get the employer that we want to come in and not the attorney for the employer. We have had in the regional boards difficulty, as I am sure all regional boards have had, that oftentimes the employer would not come in but he would send his attorney. Now, the attorney is welcome but we want the employer to come along because we feel that if the employer would come in and sit in the conference that probably a benefit would result from it, whereas the attorney would be an influence for keeping alive the dispute.

So, this bill remedies the defects that we have found.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that this bill does remedy all of the defects that experience has shown to exist in the existing recovery act, particularly in section 7 (a), and I believe it should be enacted into law, particularly so at this time when business has been brought to a high degree of organization, when to curb the activities of business which is organized to this high degree we must have on the other side an equally strong labor force organized with the Government in between keeping the balance between the two great forces. It is certainly unwise and dangerous to have business organized as it is organized under the codes, and, at the same time, not having an adequate organization or an equally balancing force on the other side. I hope very earnestly that this bill will be enacted into law as being a measure which men who have been studying the question for many years have thought to be necessary to safeguard the rights of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. James Mullenbach? Mr. Mullenbach was testifying at the time of the recess at noon and will now continue.

STATEMENT OF JAMES MULLENBACH—Resumed

Mr. MULLENBACH. I was speaking, Mr. Chairman, on that section of the bill regarding the composition of the board and urging that the three members representing the public be the only members of the board charged with voting power, that is, that the other two, the representatives of capital and the representatives of labor should have purely advisory functions on the board for the reasons, as I stated, that there will be cases, undoubtedly, in the course of the activities of this board where the public members of the public will want to reach a decision or a recommendation with which neither of the other parties will wish to concur. That has been my experience as an arbitrator for many years, that such changes are almost bound to arise.

There is another reason why the members representing capital and representing labor cannot always vote with freedom. I took up the case of A. Roga & Co., and a small employer on the north side of Chicago, manufacturing white goods, who came before our board on a charge of discrimination and refusal to deal with the Ladies' Garment Workers. They had organized his shop and in retaliation he had discharged four of his cutters and brought about a strike and a shutdown of his workers for the time being and finally brought before the regional labor board.

In an attempt by the regional labor board to adjust that difficulty they summoned Mr. Roga before the board, requesting him to appear, and he did not appear until three requests of that kind had been served upon him. Twice the board held sessions at which the workers appeared and others who were interested, but Mr. Roga did not appear and it was not until the intersession of one of his colleagues and a member of the board that he actually came before our board to reply to the charge of discrimination and refusal to deal with the representatives chosen by his people.

The chairman of the board put the question to Mr. Boga as to whether he was willing to deal with the elected representatives of his people, whether they were people within the shop or whether they were representatives of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Mr. Roga stated positively that he had not and would not deal with any representatives except a representative who was an employee in his works.

The chairman of the board cautioned him as to his statement and said, "You know, that is in violation of section 7 (a) and you know that this board is not interested at all in the unionization of your plant but we are interested in the enforcement of this act." That was President Hutchins, of the University of Chicago.

Mr. Roga said, "I am not going to deal with anyone except a representative of my own people."

When the board then took a resolution to refer this case to the National Labor Board with the recommendation to have it presented in the courts, two of the employers on that board voted against that resolution. They were members of the association of which this gentleman was a member. They were holding together and they were giving evidence of their class consciousness. I have no doubt but what that board, if they were in the position where there were 10,000 men on strike in the stockyards in Chicago and the regional labor board felt that was an illegal strike and required a determination of it by vote of the workers, representatives on that board would not give their consent to it, and for that reason I feel that these two parties on the board should not vote a question of that sort, and that the voting power of the board ought to be restricted to the representatives of the public.

I wanted to say a word in support of section 207, speaking out of our experience. That section refers to the question of the matter of the selection of these representatives and how they shall be certified to the employer. This section is valuable because it clarifies the powers of the board. We have found that employers, and very rightly, say to the representatives when they come forward, "How do we know that you represent the workers in our plant?"

We require a definite certification, of course, but there was in 7 (a) a way in which the representatives of the workers, the elected representatives of the workers, certified themselves to the employer, which was by calling the workers out on the street, by causing a strike, but we wish to avoid strikes, so how shall the board certify, how shall the employer be assured that these representatives really represent his workers, and this definitely states it:

> In any such investigation the Board shall be authorized to take a secret ballot of employees or to utilize any other appropriate method to ascertain their representatives.

Now, we have been doing that, but we have done it because we felt it was implied in the law. We now have a clear authorization of it in this present section.

I want to speak also of section 208 regarding the power of subpena and the production of witnesses. One of the greatest handicaps that we have in Chicago in bringing about satisfactory mediation and negotiations with employers and the workers was the refusal of the employers to come into the conference.

As Dr. Lapp said, it is true that many of these employers were small, and perhaps they did not realize the full significance of this request set out; to be sure, in a way, it was informal and there was nothing especially legalistic about the style of it. They would not come in and the afternoon might be wasted by the Board just listening to one side of the case.

I recall that in the case of the Greyhound Bus Line we held that case for—we have three different sessions on that case before we could get any representative of the bus line to come in, and I happen to know that they came at that time only because one of the members of the Board representing the employers' end of it saw to it that the representative of the bus line was present.

To be able to have the books and records produced and the pay rolls produced will be a very great assistance in helping to bring about a successful mediation and negotiation.

We had a case just recently in the oil trade out West, in a hearing that I had, and there was a division of opinion on the part of the oil company with regard to the professed representatives, and the question was whether there should be an election or some other form of election, and I asked the attorney for the company if they would not supply us with a list of their employees. He said he would take it under consideration, and I suppose he consulted with his associates, and they decided they would not supply the list to us, so we had no method of checking the names of the workers in this plant.

All of that would be done away with by reason of this provision. We could ask for that and it would be a perfectly reasonable request and I think it is a reasonable one.

There is another reason why this provision for bringing the parties before the Board I think is altogether worth while, and that relates to these charges of discrimination. Now, I do not happen to have the fortune and experience of being trained in the law, but I think lawyers will know perhaps better than anybody else how difficult it is to prove discrimination because it involves proof of motive and the proof of motive, as you know, can never be exact as a thing of direct evidence unless some incautious employer in this industry tells you in so many words he has fired the men because they joined the union. We have had some cases of that kind but more employers are far more cautious than that, and in order to prove an ulterior reason for an action requires a deduction from a certain concatenation of circumstances, and those cannot all be assembled.

I worked in a machine shop as a youth for 5 years and we knew in the shop who the "soups" were and the "suckers", as we called them, who carried the tales to the foreman and the management, and every man on the floor knew that when you were talking to those two or three fellows you had to look out, so we looked out. We could not prove that if we were hauled before a regional labor board to make good our assertion of our opinion—we could not have done it—yet we were perfectly certain of it.

That is what I mean by the difficulty of proving discrimination, but the bringing in of pay rolls to show the duration of time that this group of men were employed as against those who were discharged is evidence of that kind that will help substantiate these charges or set them aside.

I want to reiterate what Dr. Lapp has just said about the significance of section 5 relating to the phrase dealing with collective bargaining, to exert every reasonable effort to make an agreement with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

We had a dispute that our board was undertaking to adjust in Chicago with one of our big pastry stores.

I had called on the head of that store and explained to him that this particular section of his store had become organized. I said, "I believe they have become unionized." I said, "Are you willing to meet with the head of the union and deal with them?"

He said, "I know what the requirement of section 7 (a) is; I have to meet them; but I want to tell you now that I do not intend to deal with them in the sense of granting them the results they are expecting."

I said, "You will be willing to meet with them and talk with them?" and he said "Yes."

So, in the hope that something would come out of it I arranged with the representative of the Amalgamated to call upon him, and it was an entirely unsuccessful conference because when I spoke to the Amalgamated representative later to see whether he had succeeded in adjusting the matter, he said, "Well, we met, but I could not collect and I could not bargain." So, a strike was called and that store is being picketed.

Now, those are the only suggestions I have to make with regard to special phases of the bill. I am for the whole bill as it is. I would like to have the privilege that you indicated this morning, Mr. Senator, of supplying a supplementary statement with regard to what I think is the big underlying problem that this bill is intended to meet.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Mullenbach.

Mr. Chipman, how much time would you like?

Mr. CHIPMAN. About 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name?

STATEMENT OF A. J. CHIPMAN

Mr. CHIPMAN. My name is A. J. Chipman, of Denver, Colo.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your association with this problem?

Mr. CHIPMAN. General Chairman, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen for approximately 17 years, on the Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad, Labor Compliance Director, acting since March 1, 1924, for the State of Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. CHIPMAN. It is not our purpose, gentlemen, to attempt to elaborate on the statements made with respect to company unions and their effect on other classes of employees on railroads beyond the statements made by President Green of the American Federation of Labor yesterday morning.

In substance, Mr. Green has stated our experience and observation with respect to that character of organization on railroads.

We want to add this, however, which we believe is significant, that, of course, beginning with 1922 we have experienced the actual creation and the carrying out of those company unions under railroads has been not only annoying and a matter that invites disputes with other employees, but the carriers have gone beyond that to provoke their other employees to a degree that really invites strikes and everything incident thereto.

To illustrate just one point, and it is typical of the whole situation as we figure it; in 1932 when the train service employees of all railroads in Colorado were endeavoring to secure the so-called Full Crew Bill through legislation, and when it had reached a point where the employees were feeling that all inclinations appointed to the enactment of that measure into law, the forces of the company unions on all railroads within the State were marshaled into a hearing. They testified that of course if that concession was granted to one class of employees it would result, of course, in the other classes of employees being removed from the service gradually because of the increased cost that would force the carriers to curtail other expenses.

That, in a measure, is typical of what happens when organizations of that character are permitted to prevail.

Now, insofar as the N.R.A. side of the situation is concerned, we, of course, believe that this bill is essential; we think it vital to a proper application of the Industrial Recovery Act. Without it we feel that there is no real measure by which we can hope to apply the provisions of that law. We have in the brief 2 weeks' time that we have been endeavoring to adjust complaints under that set-up, adjusted six out of a great number that have accumulated in the office.

The smaller employer seems anxious to meet the issue and settle the question and get behind him. The larger employer of course, comes in with his attorney and they are standing on their rights, so-called, and it is almost impossible to do anything with them.

Now, we have a situation that we can point to that may be helpful to this committee. It has occurred on the Southern Pacific Railroad with respect to the activities of the Pacific-Greyhound Line, the bus company, opposing the efforts of those men to join an organization of their choice, and if your committee is willing we have the chairman of that carrier here who will testify very briefly as to just their experience in that respect, and he has with him a number of affidavits, but they are of the nature that in all fairness to the men who made them, they should not be divulged at a public hearing for fear that those men will lose their jobs; so, if it is permissible we would like to present them to your committee, not in the public hearing, so these names would not be divulged, if that be permissible.

It is information that your committee should have and it shows concrete illustrations of how far some people are going with these things.

The CHAIRMAN. How many are there?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Possibly a dozen.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to insert them in the record and eliminate both the employees' and the employers' names?

Mr. CHIPMAN. If that would be permissible.

The CHAIRMAN. I see no objection to that. When you present them they may be put into the record.

Mr. CHIPMAN. In conclusion, we are very much in favor of the bill. We think it vital to the proper application of the Industrial Recovery Act and we trust that it will become a law.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Moffet will present those affidavits right now.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Moffet?

STATEMENT OF CLARENCE W. MOFFETT

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name, please?

Mr. MOFFET. Clarence W. Moffet of San Francisco, 861 Pacific Building.

The CHAIRMAN. Your occupation or business?

Mr. MOFFET. Senior vice chairman, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity are you appearing before this committee, individually or representing your group?

Mr. MOFFET. As a representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

The CHAIRMAN. You have some affidavits that you would like to present to the committee?

Mr. MOFFET. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Referred to by the last witness?

Mr. MOFFET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have the names been eliminated, or do you want to leave it to us to have the names eliminated in the printing of them and return them to you?

Mr. MOFFET. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you present the affidavits, please?

(The papers were submitted by the witness.)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want the affidavits returned to you in person?

Mr. MOFFET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The stenographer will take these affidavits and transcribe them for the Public Printer, eliminating the names of the parties to the affidavits and the place and the location and they will be printed accordingly.

(The affidavits referred to by the witness, Mr. Moffett, are as follows:)

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss.

To whom it may concern:

I, ——— ——— bus driver of the Pacific Greyhound Lines in San Francisco, was notified September 28, 1933, by Mr. J. W. Krug, superintendent of division 4 of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, that Mr. Buck Travis, president of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, wished to see me at once in his office. I reported in Mr. Travis' office at approximately 4:30 p.m. that date, securing an immediate audience with him, and the following represents, in substance, my conversation with him.

Mr. Travis stated that he had been informed that after the meeting of the bus drivers called September 27 for the purpose of discussing the Employees' Association, or in other words, the company union, I took a number of the men who had been present to the office of Mr. C. W. Moffett, acting general chairman of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. I admitted that I had done so, but no man was forced to go and in doing so exercised his own free will.

Mr. Travis also stated that he had been informed I had made the statement to drivers that they were a bunch of "d--n fools" if they did not accept the opportunity presented them by virtue of the National Industrial Recovery Act to become affiliated with a bona fide labor organization. In answering Mr. Travis' statement, I stated I had not forced or tried to coerce in any way any individual to whom I have talked, merely presenting my feelings and explaining to them the advantages of being affiliated with any bona fide labor organization * * * I stated that my preference is the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen and asked the men if they desired to investigate what this organization has to offer.

At this point Mr. Travis made the statement that it was plain to him that had he first enlisted my services I would have been instrumental in assisting the formation of the Company Employees' Association and that the present condition would not have existed. I replied to Mr. Travis that I had not been enlisted by any organization, in particular not the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, as one would infer from his statement, for the purpose of influencing fellow drivers to join a labor organization. I wish to emphatically state that I have not influenced any individual with whom I have come in contact, nor have I been asked to do so by any labor organization. My reason for taking the initiative in this matter is not from a selfish standpoint but for the betterment of working and wage conditions of all the members in the driving ranks, not only on the Pacific Greyhound Lines but on all bus lines concerned. I might state that another reason for my asking the men to investigate both sides of the story is to show them the advantages of being affiliated with a bona fide labor organization which is in a position to give them the proper representation and endeavor to improve working and wage conditions, which we could not hope to secure from a company union. To go more into detail, it would mean that any bona fide labor organization of their own choosing would draw up a contract of working conditions and wage scales, with the assurance of a fair hearing in any difficulty which may arise relative to their duties.

I have also made the statement that under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act the Government has informed employers that they must negotiate with any representatives chosen by the men.

Mr. Travis asked me why I had affiliated with an organization so inimical to our class of transportation, also if I thought I was using good judgment, in fairness to myself and my fellow employes, in stating to other fellow employes my choice of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen to represent me in negotiating the above-mentioned contract. To this I replied I was entitled to choose my own representation. Mr. Travis said he still thought I am making a mistake in joining an organization which has fought us so bitterly ever since the origination of bus transportation and asked if I am foolish enough to believe that any railroad brotherhood would serve us as well as they have served the railroad men.

He asked if I had read the article given the press by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, opening the way for enrollment in their organization. At this point he asked if I believed this to be a Pacific coast movement only, and I replied to my knowledge it is a national movement. He informed me that upon wiring and communicating by telephone with the East they advised they are not confronted with conditions of a like nature, to which I replied that I am thoroughly convinced it is in the form of a national movement.

He also stated that he could have taken the same stand as other employers by releasing men who affiliated or expressed their desire to affiliate with a labor organization, adding that he had word from the East that 250 men are at his disposal. I asked Mr. Travis if he anticipated a strike or any other trouble to arise from this situation. He said no. I advised him that the men have no intention nor is it the purpose of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, which organization is apparently the choice of the Pacific Greyhound bus drivers to act as their representative, to resort to strikes to secure any request they might make upon the management.

Mr. Travis said he thought it would be unwise on the part of the men to affiliate with an organization that would not have their best interests at heart; however, he admitted that if we were to form an independent association of our own we would be in no position, financially, to support the proper legal representation necessary to guarantee a perpetual working agreement. He made the statement that he felt the same issue regarding the drivers becoming affiliated with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen had gone beyond recall but suggested that we become affiliated with some other labor organization. He also stated that he would never deal with any railroad brotherhood after having fought them for so many years for the reason they were so inimical to the bus transportation interests, further stating that if the issue were forced and he had to recognize the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen as the drivers' representatives he would step out and let someone else do it. He also said that he would rather deal with any other organization on a strike basis than to deal with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

For the purpose of securing a definite statement from Mr. Travis regarding his desire to have all of the drivers join the Company Employees' Association, I informed him that if he wished I would, as a disinterested party, present the company's standpoint to the drivers on my division but would not endorse either its acceptance or rejection. Mr. Travis stated he believed that if I were to offer my approval of giving the Employees' Association, or the company union, a trial the men would be inclined to accept same and in return he would not offer me anything which would insult my integrity for taking this matter before the boys but at some future date I would be rewarded in some way that would not insult my personal integrity.

This closed our discussion.

To whom it may concern:

I, ——— ———, wife of ——— ———, bus driver employed by the Pacific Greyhound Lines, was called this date into the office of Mr. W. E. Travis, president, Pacific Greyhound Lines, when he endeavored to persuade me to use my influence on my husband, Mr. ——— ———, to withdraw his efforts toward the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen and to support the company's union.

Mr. Travis asked what I had against the company union and I explained that it was due to undesirable working conditions and rates of pay.

He stated that he wants to put this company union across and, in order to do so, it is necessary to have the support of all drivers, that everybody concerned would have to work in harmony and those not in harmony would have to be eliminated.

He further stated that he would like to see me change my attitude and not to be so terribly bitter.

He also stated that he would recognize any other union but the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, because the Brotherhood is out to break the bus industry, which would result in the Pacific Greyhound Lines going into receivership, and then everyone would be out of a job.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.,
September 30, 1933.

To whom it may concern:

I, ——— ———, bus driver of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., have been called before three different officials of the Pacific Greyhound Lines in an attempt on their part, to influence me in my choice of an organization to represent me.

The company association has twice been presented to the drivers on division no. 4 and both times has been rejected by a large majority vote. We stated the first time the association was rejected; we did not care to further associate ourselves with an association formed by the company.

Prior to the last meeting, I was called into Mr. L. D. Jones's office, general manager of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, at which time he tried to influence me against my preference of an organization. I stated my preference to be the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. He informed me that Brotherhood does not have the company's or employees' best interests at heart. I replied I was entitled to make my own choice. I closed the conversation by explaining to Mr. Jones that I clearly understood the interpretation of his explanation why I should not join the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

To whom it may concern:

I, ——— ———, employed as bus driver on the Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., was called into the office of Mr. W. E. Travis, president, Pacific Greyhound Lines, on October 3, 1933, when I was requested by one E. A. Raymond, representative of the company union, to sign the following telegram:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.,
October 3, 1933.

WARREN MACY,
Pacific Greyhound Lines,
Los Angeles, Calif.

Division 4 and 6 are 80 percent for Employees' Association. Have the boys on division 3 get in line."

This request was made of me in the presence of Judge Lucas, chief counsel for the Pacific Greyhound Lines; Mr. Johnson, agent of the Pacific Greyhound Lines Terminal in Oakland, Calif., and secretary of the company union; and Mr. A. F. Martin, representative of the company union.

This request was made upon me due to the fact that it was alleged I have been actively engaged in soliciting the drivers to affiliate with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, and it was stated by Messrs. Raymond and Martin and concurred in by Mr. Johnson that the telegram above quoted would influence the bus drivers on division 3 to join the company union.

To whom it may concern:

On account of my activities and affiliation with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, I have on numerous occasions, as stated before, been called into the offices of the officials of the Pacific Greyhound Lines.

On October 3, 1933, I was again called to the office of Mr. W. E. Travis, president Pacific Greyhound Lines, when he informed me that we must all get behind the company union and put it across before the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen can get in and organize the bus drivers.

I signed an application to join the company union to preclude the possibility of further interference or coercion by the company or representatives of the company union because I have affiliated with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

I, ——— ———, employed as a bus driver by the Pacific Greyhound Lines, was accosted by Mr. A. Freyschlag, who is superintendent of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, and I was asked if I had joined the Brotherhood. I replied: "Sure, I have." He then said: "I'm sorry to hear that, as they can do nothing for you." He then went on to say: "They are in bad financial condition and all they want is your money." He also said: "I am talking to you as a friend, you understand, and not as your superintendent, and have your best interests at heart and am sorry to see you do this and hope you will reconsider."

OCTOBER 19, 1933.

Mr. C. W. MOFFITT,
861 Pacific Building,
San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Herewith inclosed affidavit of ——— ———. The minutes of the meeting held October 14, 1933, which I forwarded to you under date of October 18 is a true record of the proceedings of the meeting of October 14, 1933, to which this affidavit makes reference.

Fraternally yours,

P. N. SCHLIZ.

drivers attending. That Mr. Travis, president of the Pacific Greyhound Bus Lines, Inc., presided over the meeting as chairman during the duration of the meeting.

Mr. Travis discussed in the meeting the question of drivers affiliating with the Drivers' Association as against their affiliation with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

To whom it may concern:

On the night of October 2, 1933, I was told by the Pacific Greyhound Lines dispatcher in Oakland, Calif., to report to Mr. W. E. Travis, President of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, the following day:

At 10:15 A. M., October 3, I entered Mr. Travis' office at 9 Main Street, San Francisco, Calif.

Mr. Travis said: "——— ———, you have been unduly active for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. Now, understand, I am not denying your right to join an organization of your own choosing, but you have been active at Davis Junction on company time, which is not right."

I replied that any conversations with other drivers regarding choosing between the company union and the Brotherhood had not been allowed to interfere with company work.

Mr. Travis said: "Nevertheless, you have been doing it on company time and it must stop."

Mr. Travis said: "You are doing the wrong thing in joining the Brotherhood. Those are the same men who were complaining about busses taking the bread and butter out of their mouths. Do you expect them to change overnight? All they want is the money of you men."

I replied that I had talked with railroad men many times at the towns of Redding, Weed, and Dunsmuir about the transportation business, and their organization, and that it is my opinion they have changed their minds about busses and that they want to get on the "band wagon", as it were, by getting into the bus business themselves, and that they believe it their right to organize the bus drivers as the Pacific Greyhound Lines is a subsidiary of the Southern Pacific Co.

Mr. Travis said:

"Pacific Greyhound Lines are not a subsidiary of the Southern Pacific Co. and, if they are organizing on that assumption, then they have no right to organize you men. I will show you that the Southern Pacific Co. owns but a third of Pacific Greyhound Lines."

Mr. Travis then pressed a desk button and a man entered the office, who Mr. Travis told to get certain papers. This man left the office and soon reappeared with some papers which he handed to Mr. Travis. Mr. Travis then read from the papers the names of various stockholders and the number of shares held by them.

I told Mr. Travis that I had understood that the Southern Pacific Co. controlled two thirds of Pacific Greyhound Lines, that I had no faith in the Southern Pacific Co.'s dealings with labor and that they (the Southern Pacific Co.) had not only altered that opinion but had strengthened it in their management of the Pacific Greyhound Lines for the last couple of years, in the persons of former Southern Pacific Co. officials who were transferred to the Pacific Greyhound Lines after the merger of the three companies.

Mr. Travis said:

"I have not been in active touch with the affairs of the company for some time, and possibly things have not been all that they could be, but I propose to change those conditions that are not right, and I think it can be done very fairly through the Employees' Association. But I will not have anything to do with the brotherhood. They have imposed conditions and restrictions on the railroads that are part of the reasons why so many of the railroads are virtually bankrupt today. Some years ago I had some labor troubles with the chauffeurs in this city. I had a man by the name of Dixon arrested for paying men to put emery dust in motors of my cars. This Dixon was and still is an official of the Chauffeurs' Union here. In spite of that experience with this man Dixon and the Chauffeurs' Union, I would a hundred times rather deal with them than with the brotherhood."

I told Mr. Travis that he had given me something to think about and left his office.

On September 15, 1933, a meeting was held in the Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., Terminal in San Francisco, for the purpose of submitting to the drivers a working agreement and bylaws of a proposed employees association.

After these bylaws and the working agreement had been read there was considerable discussion by the 23 drivers present.

Following the discussion a motion was made to take a vote to decide whether we, the drivers, wished an employees' association. The 23 men present voted unanimously to reject the employees' association in its entirety.

We the undersigned drivers were present at this meeting.

On September 27, 1933, a meeting was held in the Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., terminal, in San Francisco, for the purpose of submitting to the drivers a revised bylaws and working agreement of the proposed employees' association.

After these bylaws and working agreement had been read, there was considerable discussion by the 27 drivers present.

Following the discussion a motion was made to take a vote to decide whether or not we, the drivers, wished an employees' association.

Twenty-six of the drivers present voted to reject the employees association, also the bylaws and working agreement.

One driver present voted to accept.

We, the undersigned drivers, were present at the meeting of September 27, 1933, San Francisco, Calif.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and county of San Francisco, ss:

I, ——— ———, bus driver in the employ of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., was summoned to the office of Mr. W. E. Travis, president of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, and the following represents substantially what he said to me:

Mr. Travis told me that if he knew of any man in his employ who is organizing or influencing other drivers to join the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen he would discharge him, regardless of what the cost or result might be, and he would not give a d—n what the National Recovery Administration or anyone else thought about it.

He asked me if I joined the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, and I told him that I was 100 percent brotherhood. He then said that any man who would not work his way would not work for him.

He said that he would sanction any union but the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen and that there is one man in this world, above all, with whom he would absolutely refuse to do business, and that is Mr. C. W. Moffitt.

Mr. Travis said that if he knew at the moment that I had at any time solicited or caused any driver to become a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen he would fire me; in fact, if necessary, he would fire every man; that he would not tolerate any man working against him and that he is paying the men wages to work for him and not against him.

To whom it may concern:

I, ——— ———, was contacted by Mr. Krug, superintendent of division no. 4 of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., at Salinas, Calif., October 17, 1933, and requested by him to sign the revised constitution, bylaws, and working agreement prepared by the Drivers' Association, or company union.

Mr. ——— ———, another driver on division no. 4 of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, was also asked, in my presence, to sign the same document.

Mr. Krug further requested Mr. ——— and me to sign a form withdrawing power of attorney given the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen to represent us in negotiating an agreement covering rates of pay and working conditions.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and county of San Francisco, ss:

I, ——— ———, bus driver of the Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., was confronted by Drivers' Association representative, Mr. Mieninger, to join the company union. I refused and was told that I might as well turn in my tools and quit, and he said I was cutting my own throat.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand these affidavits to be just what? Just what are they?

Mr. MOFFETT. To prove coercion.

The CHAIRMAN. Affidavits presented to show that employees in a particular industry were coerced in the organization of a company union?

Mr. MOFFETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHIPMAN. In their efforts to seek representatives of their own choosing.

The CHAIRMAN. And the facts are fully set forth in those affidavits?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Yes; they are, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Is there anything else you desire to say to the committee?

Mr. MOFFETT. Yes, I would like to give an outline of the procedure followed. In August of 1933 the drivers employed by the Pacific Greyhound Lines called on me and asked if they could affiliate with our organization. At the time I was very busy and I told them that I did not know.

However, later, approximately 100 of them came into the office and insisted that I find out if they could affiliate with our brotherhood and I immediately wired our international president who gave us authority to take them in.

As soon as it became known to the management of the Pacific Greyhound Lines that their employees were joining the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen they immediately started a company union, called the Drivers' Association.

During this time I had secured in excess of 250 power-of-attorney certificates giving our organization the right to represent the drivers in negotiating a contract covering rates of pay, rules, and working conditions.

As soon as the management found this out they began calling the drivers into the office, from the president on down through the general manager and the superintendent, calling them individually and handing them a contract, or a working agreement, as they called it, and also a copy of the bylaws and constitution of the Drivers' Association, and accompanying that was a revocation blank for them to sign revoking the power of attorney given our organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state the date of this?

Mr. MOFFETT. That was in August and September of 1933. All of these affidavits are dated.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want the record to disclose where this took place? I assume from what you said if the name of the company were known the employees might be replaced.

Mr. MOFFETT. That is all right, as long as the names of the individual employees are not known.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any objections to telling us where this took place and what was the name of the company?

Mr. MOFFETT. The Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc.

The CHAIRMAN. And the location?

Mr. MOFFETT. They operate between Portland, Oreg., and San Francisco, Calif.; San Francisco and Salt Lake City, Utah; and San Francisco and El Paso, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. And these employees were to be employees who operate their lines between these points?

Mr. MOFFETT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Senator WALCOTT. We better find out who owns the Greyhound Lines. Is it a railway-controlled line?

Mr. MOFFETT. I understand it to be a subsidiary of the Southern Pacific lines. They have 33⅓ percent interest, the company proper, and the stockholders of the Southern Pacific Co. own 33⅓ percent more. Mr. W. E. Travis is the president of that line, that portion of the Pacific lines.

I would like to state here that these men, in my opinion, were desirous of organizing.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they state that in the affidavit?

Mr. MOFFITT. No; they do not. They are called to perform service commonly known as protecting. They are called to go to the station, the depots, and collect baggage, load the busses, take up the tickets, for approximately 8 hours a day and they do not receive any compensation whatsoever for that. They are required during this time to handle busses from the garages or the shops to the depot and stations and they are subject to discipline and dismissal for this time that they are working without compensation.

In other words, they receive approximately 3 cents a mile for the actual mileage they drive a car or a bus. If they drive a bus 60 miles, they get 3 cents a mile for it regardless of the length of time it takes them to make the trip.

They are discharged without being given a fair and impartial hearing. They call them into the office one day and tell them they are out of service and they will let them know later. I have known of men staying around as high as 16 days before they could find out whether they were going to be reinstated or dismissed and finally they would tell them they could not use them any more.

The management has refused to produce any records whatsoever, and Mr. George Creel, chairman of the San Francisco Regional Labor Board, notified us before I left San Francisco that he was going to proceed with an election to determine who the men wanted to represent them. We take the position that we have the majority of powers of attorney to represent the majority of the drivers employed, and the company takes the position that they have revocation of all those powers of attorney and we do not have a right to represent anybody.

Now, speaking in favor of Senator Wagner's bill, I understand that that part is taken care of, it provides for conducting a Government election, it provides that the employer will produce any records necessary or required by the Board, and in several other portions of the bill I think it puts teeth in section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act. Therefore, I am heartily in hopes that the bill will pass.

Senator WALCOTT. Tell us just a word or two about those lines out your way where they have company unions, the relations of the members with your organization? There are some railways out there, are there not, where you have a company union but your own members work just the same on the road?

Mr. MOFFETT. Yes; they have a "Shop Crafts", so-called. It is a company union on the Southern Pacific proper, and hearings have been conducted by what they call adjustment boards, consisting of a foreman, master mechanic, or possibly two or three master mechanics from different divisions, and a representative of the Shop Crafts Association. If a man was discharged, they would call him in and take the evidence and decide it.

The Shop Crafts Association of the Southern Pacific Co. more or less depends on what our several labor organizations do. In fact, during the last wage movement in 1932 the officials of the Shop Crafts Association, agreed to take the 10 percent pay roll reduction 3 months before the agreement was negotiated in Chicago in 1932, and about 2 weeks after they had agreed they came out with a statement in the press that they agreed to do as the other transportation organizations agreed to do in Chicago. They really haven't any representation at all, the employees who hold official positions with the company represent them or tell them they represent them; they haven't any representation.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. The next and last witness is Dr. Paul H. Douglas.

STATEMENT OF DR. PAUL H. DOUGLAS, AUTHORITY ON LABOR PROBLEMS, PROFESSOR OF ECONOMICS, UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, will you give your full name for the record?

Dr. DOUGLAS. My name is Paul H. Douglas. I am professor of economics at the University of Chicago; a member of the Consumers' Advisory Board, National Recovery Administration, but I am speaking purely in a personal capacity. I am not here representing any group.

This bill (S. 2926) can only be understood in the light of the changed industrial situation which has been brought about by the National Industrial Recovery Act and its administration. That act in effect virtually made it mandatory for the various employers in an industry to associate themselves together. In the first place, since the proposed codes were almost invariably submitted by trade associations, there was an initial stimulus upon employers to join such associations in order to have a voice in the formation of the code submitted to the recovery administration. Secondly, once the code is promulgated, it becomes vitally important for every employer to join a trade association in order to help select the representatives of the owners upon the code authorities, and to be represented in all of the other work which the trade association or code authority carries on.

In practice, therefore, the N.R.A. has virtually compelled employers to band themselves together in self-defense and has enormously increased the power of their organizations.

Now it is, I take it, obvious that this may well lead to great abuses unless a corresponding degree of balance is introduced into our industrial system and our social policy. For public decisions, in the nature of the case, tend to follow and to register the relative strength of economic forces and of organizations. If we build up the power of organized employers, which was originally great, without correspondingly strengthening the forces of labor and the consumer, we further unbalance our system.

For with their added power the employers' associations can keep wage rates lower and hours longer than they would otherwise be. They can, in addition, obtain privileges on such matters as open-price associations, direct price fixing, the use of liberal cost formulas to fix minimum price limitations upon output, restrictions of machine hours and upon new investment which would not be given them were the balance of power more even. Finally, if one set of economic interests is powerfully organized and the others are not, the first group is likely to reach out for political and social control and to introduce a system which would be very similar to Fascism.

In order to have a democratic balance in society, it is therefore necessary that labor and the consumers should be at least equally as well organized. But section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, while framed with good intentions, has not given such equal rights and powers to the workers. Thus, while it provided that—> employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection—these were rights for which the workers in practice had to contend in many cases against great odds, and to win or lose in the hard struggle of industry.

For many employers, as Senator Wagner will probably testify, drew up for their workers plans for company unions, or shop committees, which were designed to replace the inter-company or regular trade unions as agencies for collective bargaining. Not only were the plans for these company unions drawn up by the employers, but in many cases they were apparently installed without a vote on the part of the employees. In other cases where they were submitted to a vote by the workers, the balloting generally took place on the premises or under the oversight of the company without the workers having the opportunity of hearing about the advantages of regular unionism or of voting for it as an alternative. These company unions, when set up, generally provided that the workers could only be represented by fellow-employees and not by independent outside agents, while the funds of these organizations were not only kept low, but in many cases provided by the employers themselves.

Now, there was every reason why the workers should regard such organizations as company controlled and as not providing them with the protection which would be given them by independent organizations combining the employees of many employers which would have the power of negotiating agreements on a broader scale and of being represented by fearless and independent representatives.

First, the elections were frequently held in such places and in such a manner that the workers felt they were subject to some economic duress in voting for the plan and in choosing the officers of the plant committee.

Second, even at its best the company union could only negotiate an agreement for that company and not for any other portion of the industry as a whole. It is virtually impossible, however, for the wages or working conditions in any one plant to be raised very appreciably above the general level of competing plants. In order to establish and maintain a rate of wages and a set of working conditions, it is customarily necessary to establish it for an industry as a whole or for the major portion of it in order to protect individual concerns from what would otherwise be competitive undercutting by the low-wage firms. For this purpose, the industry and not the plant should be the general unit of collective bargaining, and only the independent union can establish this.

Third, when workmen are restricted in their choice of representatives to fellow-workmen, they must be represented by men whose industrial future largely depends upon their employers. The tacit fear of future discharge or failure to obtain promotion will in most cases restrain these fellow-workmen from putting the case of their clients with the fearlessness and independence of an outsider who would not be dependent for employment upon the employer against whom the complaint was being made. Only equals can talk on terms of equality, and men whose jobs and future are dependent upon the good-will of the employers are not the equals but the economic inferiors of the latter. It may furthermore be remarked that the employers and their trade associations are not restricted for their representatives to those already actively engaged in the industry. They may, on the contrary, hire lawyers, economists, and statisticians from the outside with specialized skills to represent them. It is small wonder, therefore, that the workers should wish a reciprocal right.

Fourth, while the individual employers were federating into local and industrial bodies which would increase their economic, political, and social power, the use of company unions would prevent the workers of different companies from federating for similar purposes.

Fifth, the financial resources of the company unions or shop committees were kept low so that if they did fail to agree with the company, they would not be able adequately to finance a strike in the same way that an interplant union with its pooled reserves would be able to do.

There is good reason, therefore, why workers should prefer regular interplant unions instead of plant company unions. When, however, the workers attempted to assert this preference, they were frequently denied this opportunity by their employers who, in these cases, refused to recognize the right of the regular union to carry out the collective bargaining, and who insisted that the company union should be the bargaining agency instead.

When the workers went on strike to establish the union as the agency for collective bargaining, the matter was then put up to the National Labor Board for adjustment. This Board generally asked the strikers to return to their work under the promise that they would not be discriminated against and that an impartial plebiscite, would be held upon the question as to whether or not the workers wanted to be represented by company or regular unions. But time is of the essence of a strike, and once a strike was called off, it was possible for employers to discriminate against active union men on one pretext or another and to interpose vexatious delays to the holding of the election.

The legal powers of the National Labor Board to prevent such discrimination, to hold such neutral elections and to compel unwilling employers to abide by the result, were shadowy and uncertain. The result was, as I believe Senator Wagner will agree, that the National Labor Board with the best will in the world was forced into the assumption of responsibility without power. It was put in the position of inducing the workers to give up their chief weapon, the strike, and yet not being able to furnish them with equivalent protection and a guarantee of impartial treatment in return. The history of the Weirton, the Budd, the Harriman, and the Ford cases, together with a number of others, abundantly bear out the truth of this statement.

This put the workers, the National Labor Board, and the Government in an impossible situation, and it is a tribute to the insight, honor, and statesmanship of Senator Wagner that he has clearly seen the issues involved and has introduced S. 2926 to meet the situation. By section 5 it is provided that the workers shall really have a free choice in determining how they shall bargain and whom their representatives shall be. Company unions are not outlawed. Instead, if the workers of their own free will draw up such plans and express their preference in a free and fair election for them over the regular unions, the company unions are to be recognized.

What is prohibited is, however, that the employers shall not directly or indirectly make or influence the choice of their workers. The employers are not to propose or initiate such plans of organization or to help finance them. It is to be the workers who will make the choice. This is only fair, since the law has long since recognized that a man should not serve adverse interests or represent both buyer and seller in the same transaction or both debtor and creditor. The employer, or the buyer of labor, can choose his own bargaining agency, but he is not to help the worker, or the seller of labor, to choose his.

The National Labor Board is not only given the definite power to enforce such a just provision, but it is also given the power to prevent workers from being discriminated against because of union membership. If this act is passed, it can then induce workers to abandon a strike and return to work, secure in the knowledge that it can probably give the workers the protection which it promises.

Now, I know it will be said that this act will undoubtedly stimulate the organization of labor into regular trade unions. That such will be the result is fairly obvious. But this will be true only to the degree that the workers wish such organization. And if they wish it, they should have it just as much as the employers. In fact, I should like to submit that the organization of labor should be welcomed instead of feared. We might get along with purely individual bargaining in a period of small-scale competitive capitalism. When large-scale enterprises appeared, individual bargaining, even under competition, became inadequate.

Now that we are replacing competitive capitalism by strong associations of employers who are given the power of united action and who are coming to have even greater control over prices and production under the codes, it is, in my opinion, essential to build up organizations of labor as a counterpoise. For only so shall we obtain balance and prevent the domination of capital which seems to be the economic essence of Fascism. We must grant reciprocal rights to both parties and not exclusive rights to one, and these rights should give effective and not merely nominal freedom to organize.

And to those who fear that the organization of labor as well as capital merely paves the way to struggles which will disrupt industry, may I point out that the National Labor Board will be above both sides, and while it will not have the powers of compulsory arbitration, it can marshal the forces of public opinion and thus, in all probability, compel solutions which in the vast majority of cases will be for the general good of society. I believe, in fact, that there will be much more harmony if labor's position is recognized than if it has to fight for the very basic principle of freedom to organize.

The CHAIRMAN. And your residence?

Dr. BRISSENDEN. My home address is Dobbs Ferry, N.Y.

The CHAIRMAN. You are listed here as professor of economics, Columbia University.

Dr. BRISSENDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume from what Senator Wagner said, and others, that you have given much attention to labor problems?

Dr. BRISSENDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been interested in labor problems?

Dr. BRISSENDEN. For about 15 years or more.

The CHAIRMAN. What have been your activities in connection with them other than a study of the problems?

Dr. BRISSENDEN. I at one time was a member of the staff of the California Commission on Immigration and Housing, as special agent. In 1914 I was a special agent of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, and then at a later period I served as economic advisor for the Personnel Classification Board. Between 1915 and 1920 I was on the staff of United States Department of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have your views respecting the pending bill.

Dr. BRISSENDEN. I have a statement which I have prepared. May I read this statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Dr. BRISSENDEN. The purpose of the National Recovery Act, in the words of President Roosevelt, was "to put people back to work" at wages which would provide more than a bare living. Its objective was, he said, to provide the wages of a "decent living", as a socially desirable end in itself and as a means of effecting the increase in mass purchasing power without which business will lack the markets for its goods and services which are necessary if we are to have any real recovery.

I am heartily in sympathy with these purposes. But, in my judgment, the operation of the act, through its first 8 months of life, has worked to defeat, rather than to further these ends. It has, indeed, provided the stimulus for almost extraordinary growth in labor organizations, a truly momentous achievement, particularly so if they are given the opportunity which, unfortunately, the Act has not in fact afforded them to date.

Apart from this important gain, and the long step it has taken in the direction of the abolition of child labor, the record of the N.R.A. has been one of futility—unless one counts it a gain that big business units can now more easily than before exploit consumers, workers and the little business men. I do not believe that the N.R.A. has materially increased employment or aggregate pay rolls. In spite of it, or because of it, per capita earnings have declined. With a few exceptions, the codes (which are in effect public statutes) are being administered by code authorities wholly or almost wholly composed of business men. In the face of the Presidential warning on June 16 that if prices were allowed to run ahead of wages the whole enterprise, in the President's words, would be "set at naught" the N.R.A. has encouraged, or at least tolerated price increases that have, generally, outrun wages. There has been widespread price-fixing and limitation on production in the interest (or the presumed interest) of business groups, especially the big-business groups. There seems to have been widespread resort to monopolistic practices. Even the large growth in labor organization has been more marked in the case of company-fostered and company-dominated organizations than it has in case of independent self-organized associations.

That the central purpose of the N.I.R.A. to stimulate recovery by increasing purchasing power has not been realized seems to be clearly demonstrated by the statistics on the trend of pay rolls and employment, published by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. These figures showed considerable gains between March and September, but the codification of industry did not get going apprciably before September, so that these spring and summer gains are scarcely to be attributed to any great extent, if at all, to the N.R.A. I have taken the Bureau's figures for all manufacturing industries. I have also taken a weighted average of its figures for all industries (including manufacturing, trade, transportation, mining, utilities, banking, etc.) and, thirdly, my own weighted averages of its figures for the 18 industries whose codes were signed before October 1. The changes from September to December 1933 were as follows:

	Employment	Pay rolls	Per-capita earnings
	Percent	Percent	Percent
All industries	−1	−2	−1
Manufacturing	−5	−7	−2
18 early N.R.A. coded industries signed before Oct. 1	−4	−7	−3

The reports of the National Industrial Conference Board indicate that the cost of living increased about 0.8 percent between September and December, so that real pay rolls and real per capita earnings must have shrunk slightly more than these figures indicate.

Official statistics on hourly earnings of industrial workers naturally show increases since the length of the workweek has been shortened (as a result of the depression itself, as the result of the work-spreading movement, and as the result of the N.R.A.) often without proportionate, and sometimes without any, reductions in weekly wages. But even where the workweek is curtailed without any reduction in weekly pay rates there follows no gain in per capita earnings and no gain in aggregate pay rolls except to the extent that there is net increase in personnel. Statistics of hourly earnings, therefore, are of little or no value for the assessment of the effectiveness of the N.R.A. in accomplishing its central objective.

I think that title II, not title I, was the essential recovery section of the N.I.R.A. Title I, which covers the industrial control provisions of the act, in the very nature of these provisions, could not be expected to be effective as a recovery instrument. The management of this part of the act should have been assigned to a national reconstruction administration. The administration to which the job was assigned has made no headway toward recovery. More or less inadvertently, it has accomplished some things in the way of reconstruction.

Although extraordinary social gains could and can yet be achieved under the act, the achievements actually accomplished to date are mostly bad: Big business has been seated more firmly in the saddle, little businesses have been put in a more precarious position than ever, consumers have been undermined rather than supported, workers are not being reemployed to any appreciable extent in private business enterprise, they are not, on the average, getting any more money in their pay envelopes with which to buy "a decent living", company-dominated unions have increased more rapidly than independent ones. Some of the reconstruction results have been good: There has been a considerable increase in trade-union membership, child labor has been in large measure abolished, some competitive excesses in business have been eliminated, in a few industries employment, pay rolls and even per capita earnings increased during the fall, and apparently as a result of code operation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the operations of the codes have thus far tended to the disadvantage of the small producer?

Dr. BRISSENDEN. Yes, that is my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. In competition with the large producers?

Dr. BRISSENDEN. Yes, that is my opinion.

Senator DAVIS. What percentage of the increase in employment can be accredited to Government spending? I notice that you made a comment on it.

Dr. BRISSENDEN. I cannot tell you in terms of exact percentages, Senator Davis. I think most, if not all, of the net gain in employment has been due to the public employment. I do not mean by that to say that I do not believe there has been some gain in some industries, large gain in employment, but that has been more than offset in my opinion by the losses in employment resultant upon code operation; for instance, the items that appeared along during the fall of the 9,000 men whom Mr. Ford laid off in one of his plants, alleging, whether correctly or not, that that was the result of code operation.

Senator DAVIS. But don't you find at the end of the year, even so shut down for the time being, that production in the entire year is enough to take care of all of the needs of the country?

Dr. BRISSENDEN. It is enough, Senator Davis, I think, to take care of that part of the needs of the country for which the country's population has money to buy, but not of the potential needs of the country; no. I most emphatically do not think it is anywhere near adequate for that, and I think the statistics of living standards and budgets would confirm that to the hilt.

Senator DAVIS. I think you are correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, Professor.

Dr. BRISSENDEN. The present situation seems to me to be a perilous one. The N.R.A. is at dead center. Yet within the framework of the statute with the administration of the industrial control provisions of which the N.R.A. was entrusted, I am convinced that, supplemented by such modification of the labor provisions as this bill suggests, much sound reconstruction of our economy in the public interest, and perhaps even some visible progress toward sound and permanent recovery are possible, although I must say I look to other agencies chiefly for the accomplishment of what we call recovery.

Except for section 7 (a) I do not think the great need is for revision so much as for sharply revised administrative policies. If the code authorities are to operate in the public interest instead of being made up exclusively or almost exclusively of the trade associations, they should be tripartite bodies composed of equal numbers of representatives of employer, employee, and consumer group interests. In general, the N.R.A. and the code authorities should reverse their policy, in my opinion, of boosting or even tolerating high prices and their policy of limitation upon production and substitute a policy of price reduction, expecially in industries where consumer demand is relatively elastic, to encourage volume production. Adoption of such a price and production policy would have certain important advantages:

1. It would really encourage buying, with all of its favorable repercussions of that encouragement.

2. It would tend to bring about increases in real wages by reduction in living costs, and thus make increases in money wages less necessary and so automatically reduce the likelihood of strikes, most of which are over wage increases or union recognition.

3. It would not necessarily work any greater hardships upon the farmer than does N.R.A.'s present price policy. Indeed, there would seem to be just as much prospect of the farmer benefiting under this policy as a result of retail prices falling more than farm prices, as, under the prevailing policy, there is of his benefiting because farm prices rise more than retail prices.

The history of the past 8 months makes it clear, I think, that the collective bargaining provisions in section 7 (a) are in urgent need of clarification. Even before the act was passed, employers were hastily drafting plans for company unions with whom they might bargain much as the lion bargains with the lamb. As already noted, these company unions have increased since the N.R.A. even more rapidly than the trade unions. Strikes were deprecated. General Johnson told the American Federation of Labor convention last fall that now labor no longer needed to strike, since the Government would safeguard their rights. Then followed the long and largely futile controversies over collective bargaining and the election and recognition of employees' representatives—in the captive mines case, the Wierton case, the Budd case, the Philadelphia Rapid Transit case, and many others. Employers insisted that section 7 (a) granted to employees only the right to be represented, for collective bargaining purposes, by individuals or organizations of their own choosing, not the right to be bargained with by them.

In other words, many employers if they could not by the company union device select (from within the circle of those whom they could fire) the employee representatives with whom they would "bargain", they would do no bargaining with independently chosen representatives. If it was to be a company union the employees' rights were to have their representatives and to "bargain". If it was to be an independent union—and it should not be such if the employers could prevent it—the employees would have the representatives but they could not bargain, because the employer would not bargain with them. The reason, in the company union set-up, why the employers were willing to "bargain", even though they held the law did not require it, was that through the power to hire and fire they controlled the bargainers.

Real bargaining is impossible in my judgment with employer-dominated or employer-festered unions. Most company unions are employer dominated. Without genuine bargaining over terms of employment there is, in my opinion, little chance of bringing about the readjustments in wages and hours of work necessary to the attainment of a decent living for the mass of the workers and so a decent market for the mass of their employers. Moreover, where an employer may be able to make more money by a policy of high prices, small volume of sales, and wages kept low because unit overhead costs are made too high by limited volume, an intelligent, independent labor organization might well recognize that its best chance of a wage increase will emerge out of a policy of low prices, large volume of sales, low unit overhead costs, permitting higher wages, possibly without much reduction in profits. But such a readjustment of factors, though evidently beneficial to the consumer and in the public interest, as well as beneficial to the employees, is unlikely to be made unless there is strong economic pressure exerted by an independently organized and functioning union of employees.

It is considerations such as these which convince me that apart from changes in administrative policy and personnel the step now most urgently necessary is that which this bill proposes. In my judgment the time has come when the public interest will be most adequately protected in a big-business world where otherwise the consumer and the worker will be helpless by a public policy on industrial relations which definitely discourages both individual bargaining and the so-called "bargaining" between employer-dominated groups and the employers who dominate them and which frankly encourages collective bargaining by and between employers and the self-designated representatives of their independently organized employees.

Another weakness of section 7 (a) is the ambiguity in its language that has given rise in many quarters to the interpretation of it that the act illegalizes the closed shop. I am glad to note that Senator Wagner's bill (in section 5 (6)) definitely permits closed-shop agreements provided the union includes at least a majority of the employees. This seems to me in line with the very best democratic traditions. Minorities should have a voice, in my opinion, in the making of codes and agreements, but once the rules are decided upon the majority must not only rule, but bind the minorities. Thus, too, under the N.R.A., once a code is whipped into shape, after minorities as well as majorities have had a voice in its construction, it becomes law for all in the industry. The theory that section 7 (a) requires an employer to make, and do business under, agreements not only with the union representing the majority of his employees but also with each of perhaps several minorities and finally with every employee who wishes to bargain individually is one whose application would create an impossible situation.

Minorities may well have a hand in the negotiations constituting the agreement-forming process, but the group which gets its policies and terms written into the protocol must be the recognized group, membership in which, of course, should be open and free from inequitable restrictions, as in case of the trade associations. A minority group may become one of the high contracting parties if and when it can muster a majority. All this supports the closed-shop agreement and makes questionable from the point of view of practical necessity, at least, upon the interpretation of this part of section 7 (a) which many employers and some minority or left-wing labor groups have urged.

I do not believe that we have yet reached the stage in our economic evolution when we can wisely impair or interfere with the right to strike and I am glad to note that this bill explicitly safeguards this right. It is not easy to estimate the effect of this bill upon the extent and severity of strikes. I should think it would make them less frequent. Certainly strikes for union recognition would be less frequent, perhaps also strikes turning on the question of wages.

Insofar as the bill sets up a plan of arbitration which is voluntary rather than compulsory, it has my full approval. Compulsory arbitration, in the sense of compulsory submission and compulsory award, would result not only in prohibition of strikes, not to be desired, but also in Government fixation of wages, in my opinion still less to be desired. While I am in agreement with the bill in providing for voluntary arbitration, I prefer a scheme of compulsory submission (with compulsory investigation but without suspension of the right to strike) and voluntary award to the proposed plan of voluntary submission with compulsory award. I should rely upon publicity as the means of making the award effective.

Quite apart from the fact that compulsory arbitration has been held to be unconsituttional except in the case of utilities, the history of industrial relations in this country seems clearly to indicate that there is no escape from Government intervention, and that that intervention should adopt the method of mediation, after encouragement of conciliation, followed, if necessary, by some form of voluntary arbitration, accompanied in my opinion by compulsory submission of evidence or of compulsory investigation. An earlier witness, Professor Slichter, according to the newspapers, suggested to this committee that some provision be made to forestall the probable tendency of employers, in the event of this bill's enactment, to enter into collective bargaining agreements with company unions, or company-dominated national unions, or company-dominated locals of national unions, even those affiliated with the National Federation of Labor, in order to avoid dealing with the self-chosen representatives of their own employees. I wish to second this suggestion. Moreover, I think it important to extend its applications to cover such agreements with all company-dominated or company-sponsored unions, whether or not they happen to be intra-company organizations. Genuine collective bargaining between an employer and the self-chosen representatives of his employees, such as this bill is intended to promote, may be frustrated by the employer's negotiation of a "smart bargain" with a local of a national trade union as well as by a similar sort of bargain with a company union.

I know of at least one case of such overreaching that has reached the courts since the enactment of the N.I.R.A. It appears that the majority of the employees of the Fair Lawn Fur Dressing Co. in New Jersey were members of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union. The employer threatened to discharge his employees and to refuse to reemploy others unless they give up membership in this organization. Thereupon, 36 of the forty-odd employees struck. Immediately upon this occurrence, and while these employees were out on strike, the employer negotiated a closed-shop agreement with a local of the International Fur Workers Union, which apparently had no employees in this particular plant. The striking union applied for and obtained an injunction restraining the employer from making membership in the International Fur Workers Union a condition of employment. The case referred to is Fryns v. Fair Lawn Fur Dressing Co.

It is worth noting that the workers secured this relief, not because the employer was guilty of smart or disingenious bargaining, but apparently only because the judge considered that section 7 (a) of the N.I.R.A. outlawed the closed union shop.

But, effective prohibition of the resort to spurious contracting-out agreements, as are illustrated by the Fair Lawn case, should not have to rest upon any theory about the closed shop. I would suggest that the making of such agreements be designated an unfair practice within the meaning of this bill. This could be accomplished by adding at the end of section 5 (2) and completing that paragraph as follows:

> Provided, That any agreement made by an employer with a company-dominated or company-sponsored union (whether or not its membership is limited to employees of the said employer) for the purpose of contracting-out of the obligation in good faith to deal with self-chosen representatives of his employees shall itself be deemed an unfair labor practice, and no such agreement shall be a basis for unjunctive (sic) relief to the employer against his employees or their self-chosen representatives.

If I do not misinterpret this bill, it would require (at least if the modification I have suggested is inserted, and perhaps even without it), in the situation existing in the Fair Lawn case, that the employer scrap his agreement with the American Federation of Labor affiliate, the International Fur Workers Union, and negotiate and enter into an agreement (which might or might not contain a closed-shop clause) with the Needle Trade Workers Industrial Union. He would be required to abandon the first agreement, not because it is a closed-shop contract, and certainly not because it is an American Federation of Labor affiliate, but because it is an agreement deviously entered into with an organization including at best only a minority and at worst none of his employes, with the purpose of evading the necessity of dealing with the self-designated representatives of a majority of his employees. He would be require in good faith to negotiate and in the words of the present bill, "to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain (an) agreement(s) with" the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, because if the facts of the case have not been misstated that union has the shop organized. If another year the International Fur Workers' Union can win the allegiance of a majority in the Fair Lawn Shop, the employer will have to deal with it.

This illustration of the application of the present bill to a concrete case ought to make it evident, it seems to me, that the bill sets up no labor dictatorship. In a recent press dispatch the directors of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, following the lead of the steel industry, starting a procession of those great business interests which in the past have virtually dominated American industrial life, are reported to have asserted that this bill "would result in giving a labor-union official virtual domination over American industrial life." That is absurd, of course. If what is meant is that this bill will give organized labor such a dominant position, still I should dissent.

I believe that this bill, if passed, will do much to redress the disastrous unbalance that exists between the buyers and the sellers of labor. I hope and believe that it will materially facilitate the campaign for the complete organization of American industry. I hope and expect that it will make life hard for company-dominated and company-sponsored unions. All these things will be sound gains in the way of permanent reconstruction, and I place these things first. What the effect of the bill upon recovery may be I hesitate to predict. In the conditioning atmosphere of the sound reconstruction of industrial relations it should help to bring about, particularly if amended in some such way as the present bill proposes, I should expect that it would tend definitely to discourage the kind of recovery that may lead us into another speculative debauch. Through better balanced bargaining activities and the resultant lessening of extreme inequalities in the distribution of wealth, I should expect it substantially to further the kind of recovery that will be permanent because it deserves to be permanent.

Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you, Professor, for your presentation.

Senator WAGNER. Professor, in view of the fact that you referred to this news dispatch which you read, that I also read in the papers, with reference to the effect of this legislation, this propaganda which has been pretty wide-spread, that the purpose of this act is to impose some particular union upon the manufacturers of the United States, as a matter of fact, I want to know whether you agree with me that this bill does not do anything of this kind except that it does make a workers a free man so he may decide whether he wants a union or not, and, if he wants one, what particular union he wants to represent him, or whether he wants to remain unorganized. Is that not all that the legislation does?

Dr. BRESSENDEN. I think that is true. I think that the New Jersey case I referred to illustrates it. Instead of this bill imposing any particular union upon the employer, it will merely result in giving effect to their wishes.

Now, it happened in the Fair Lawn case that their wishes, if I understand the facts in the case, were that they should be represented by the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, and I believe that every member in the direct labor part of the factory was a member of that organization, and not one a member of the other union.

Now, the employer negotiated this agreement for the purposes of getting rid of the bulk of his employees or force them to join this other union which was an American Federation of Labor Union, and which was thrown out as a result of this court's decision.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Dr. BRISSENDEN. May I add just this one word, if you will indulge me, in regard to this present situation in the automobile industry?

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have this information.

Dr. BRISSENDEN. I firmly believe that if some such scheme as is proposed by Senator Wagner's bill were now in effect that, first, this present situation would not have reached the critical pass which it has now reached, because the bill would have provided, if its terms were essentially as set down here, for a control and elimination of such unfair labor practices and enlistment of company-dominated unions to serve as farcial substitutes for genuine unions could not have made the headway it has made in the automobile industry; secondly, I think the likelihood of avoidance of the strike—I hope in any event it may be avoided but I am not one who believes that peace at any price in any industry is preferable to war—I think that in this present situation we have two very important groups, on the side of the automobile manufacturers and on the side of the American Federation of Labor, and I think that those groups can adjust this situation.

It will require concessions. I think that the concessions which will be required are not concessions which will in any fundamental way interfere with the effective on-go of business enterprise in the industry involved, and I think the history of industrial relations in the printing trades, in the needle trades, and on the railroads of this country is ample demonstration of the fact that an industry does not die of union management cooperation involving negotiations and joint administration of the labor phases of the industry even with a union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Now, if in this present situation the automobile employers will concede what to my mind is the very real necessity, the recognition of the necessity for intercompany scope on the part of the union and the necessity that the representatives be freely and independently chosen by the employees; if, on the contrary, the American Federation of Labor will concede the necessity for a very drastic and long overdue reconstruction in the structural set-up of its organizations, if it will give assurances that the now partial industrial character of the organizations in the automobile trade, these Federal unions which are not craft unions, as I understand it—if the Federation will give assurances to the employers of the automobile industry that they will maintain and strengthen the industrial character of the organizations in the shops and not allow the traditional craft union as such to get a foothold in the industry, I think there may be present the basis of a real statesmanlike settlement of the issue; and, further, if the employers will offer in addition to some assurance of the recognition of the union, some assurance of stability of tenure, and the union on the other side will offer to cooperate to its fullest ability in maintaining an efficient production there, I think there might be along those lines some possibility of effecting a workable adjustment of the points at issue.

Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Professor.

Professor Otto Beyer.

STATEMENT OF OTTO BEYER

The CHAIRMAN. Your name, please?

Mr. BEYER. Otto Beyer.

The CHAIRMAN. You are listed here as an industrial engineer, now with the Federal Coordinator of Transportation.

Mr. BEYER. Correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your residence?

Mr. BEYER. It is in Virginia; McLean, Va.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your occupation before you became an industrial engineer with the Federal Coordinator?

Mr. BEYER. I am not an industrial engineer with the Federal Coordinator of Transportation. I am director of the section of labor relations with the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, but my profession has been that of an engineer who has in the last 15 years devoted his time to the promotion of constructive relations between labor and management in industry.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have your views.

Mr. BEYER. I would like to add, if I may, in that general direction, that I take it my reason for having been asked to present my views on the bill this morning grows out of my experience in the field of industrial relations.

The thing I have been peculiarly interested in, and to which I devoted my time, has been the development of so-called "union" management relations on the railroads and some private industries, the point being to integrate labor with management to the end that the purposes of industry would be better served. Some of the industries in which this activity has gone on largely under my direction are the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, the Canadian National Railroad, and some private concerns in Chicago and in Massachusetts.

Now, I should like also to say at the beginning that in speaking as I do I am speaking purely in my private capacity and not as a representative of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation.

I should like to observe at the very beginning that I would prefer to confine my remarks more or less specifically to the bill. I would like to make one or two general remarks about the bill, however, and that is this, that in the situation with which we are confronted at the moment, especially under the codes, that a law of this kind be enacted for the purpose of facilitating compliance with the codes.

It strikes me as an almost impossible task if the National Recovery Administration were to undertake the responsibility of and by itself to bring about complete compliance with the codes. It must, in other words, have the assistance of labor properly organized in industry to facilitate that process, and I should like, if I may, to call the committee's attention to the fact that in those industries where labor is now functioning in an independent capacity, notably the men's garment industry, the women's garment industry, the printing industry, and in the railroad industry, that we do not have the difficulties, the complaints are not forthcoming in those industries we find in other industries.

In other words, this particular bill, which I like to refer to as a bill for the purpose of adjusting industrial disputes and facilitating conciliation in industry, would bring about in my estimation a very essential contribution in the way of compliance on the part of employers and employees in industry with the various provisions of the codes. I think that is absolutely necessary and essential.

Now, I would also like to call the committee's attention, if I may, to the fact that we here in the United States have been singularly behindhand in enacting legislation of this kind. I checked that situation up this morning with the international labor office, and they handed me a document which reviewed the practice in every country, and the outstanding thing about the United States is that in only one industry, the railroad industry, have we enacted legislation for the purpose of bringing about the peaceful adjustment of disputes on the one hand, and the only other agency that we have is an agency established in the Department of Labor, the United States Conciliation Service, which has no authority in law, but which is the only means of occasionally standing by to bring about and maintain peace and harmony in industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the international labor organization be in a position to give us information as to what other countries have done along the line of legislation of this kind?

Mr. BEYER. Yes, indeed. Here is a document which I think is exceedingly valuable, and, if I may, I would like to put it at the disposal of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. We would like to have it. Is that document confined entirely to questions involved in this legislation?

Mr. BEYER. Conciliation and arbitration of industrial disputes. It reviews the practice in every country.

The CHAIRMAN. We should like very much to have it.

Mr. BEYER. I would be glad to leave it, if I may. It is entitled "International Labor Office, studies and reports, series A (industrial relations) no. 34, Conciliation and Arbitration in Industrial Disputes; Geneva, 1933."

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose this organization probably could give us a codification of it. Are they equipped to do that?

Mr. BEYER. A codification of it? I think they would be glad to. I will take it up with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they located?

Mr. BEYER. Here in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it would be very helpful to the committee if they could give us a very brief, concise statement of what legislation has been enacted in the different countries of Europe along the line of this proposal. Don't you think so, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. I know all about the organization. We are not members of it, but we really ought to be.

Senator DAVIS. It is part of the League of Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. We are such busy men here that it is difficult for us to get the time to go through documents like this. I think we might well have the summary go into the record. I suggest that we obtain that summary and have it printed in the record.

Senator WAGNER. They are willing to let us come in without joining the League of Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. BEYER. As I indicated earlier in my remarks, I would like very much to confine my remarks more or less specifically to certain features of the bill, believing in that way I can be most helpful.

Now, the first section of the bill of broad interest is section 5, dealing with the so-called "unfair labor practices". I am sure it will interest the committee to know that we have in this country, as a result of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, had some experience in bringing about compliance with so-called "unfair labor practices" in the railroad industry.

The situation is briefly this: When the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act was passed, by reference was incorporated in it certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, which in essence on those railroads in bankruptcy or in the hands of a judge or trustees, prohibited certain practices analogous in principle to these practices spelled out in section 5.

When the Emergency Act was passed it became the duty of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation to bring about compliance with these prohibitions incorporated in the Emergency Act, and in my capacity as Director of Labor Relations I had the general job of seeing to it that that particular responsibility was properly furthered.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Beyer, may I emphasize right here—you know one of the attacks upon this bill is that, besides being vicious, it is entirely novel.

Mr. BEYER. It is not novel.

Senator WAGNER. Of course.

Mr. BEYER. Exactly. I would like to make that point, because what I would like to present, if I may, in advocacy of that very feature, is the fact that we have had that experience and as a result of that experience certain conclusions are already warranted, conclusions which have already been called to the attention of the Senate and the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The experience you have had was the result of voluntary action by employers and employees?

Mr. BEYER. Well, no; this is the result of action inaugurated by the Coordinator of Transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. Since that establishment was set up?

Mr. BEYER. Since that establishment was set up.

The CHAIRMAN. How much experience have you had?

Mr. BEYER. Well, since June. I cannot give you any quantitative measure of the experience.

The CHAIRMAN. That is voluntary to the extent that it has been done by the Coordinator himself?

Mr. BEYER. Well, the Coordinator called the attention of various carriers to certain practices which are now prohibited, which practices, as I say, are analogous to those spelled out in this bill.

Senator WAGNER. Prohibited where?

Mr. BEYER. By the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of 1933.

Senator WAGNER. By law?

Mr. BEYER. By law, exactly.

Now, if I may read from a circular issued to all carriers by the Coordinator under date of September 7, I will just read this first page:

The many complaints which I have received lead me to believe that one important feature of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 1933, has been overlooked or misunderstood. Section 7 (e) makes applicable to all railroads certain paragraphs in the Bankruptcy Act which there apply to railroads operated by a judge or trustee. The result is that it is now unlawful for any railroad to:

(1) Deny or in any way question the right of its employees to join the labor organization of their choice.

(2) Interfere in any way with the organizations of its employees.

(3) Use its funds in maintaining so-called company unions.

(4) Influence or coerce its employees in an effort to induce them to join or to remain members of such company unions.

(5) Require any person seeking employment to sign a contract or agreement promising to join or not to join a labor organization. And if such a contract has been enforced, the railroad is required to notify its employees by an appropriate order that said contract has been discarded and is no longer binding on them in any way.

Now, those are the provisions in the Emergency Act.

The CHAIRMAN. What provision is there for enforcing it?

Mr. BEYER. The Emergency Act simply provides, similar to the processes which are laid down in the——

The CHAIRMAN. N.R.A.?

Mr. BEYER. No, not in the N.R.A.; in this act here, that the matter in the event of noncompliance may be referred to the Department of Justice for enforcement. If I may, I will try and confine——

The CHAIRMAN. That act went beyond the mere declaration of the rights of employees?

Mr. BEYER. Oh, indeed; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the difficulty with the Recovery Act is that it merely made a declaration?

Mr. BEYER. That is the difference, exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. And did not provide the way in which it should be enforceable. I would like you to give us the citation in that act of the method of enforcement.

Mr. BEYER. It is pages 3, 4; page 6, paragraph 12; and page 10 (13).

The Coordinator said specifically:

I deem it my duty to see to it, so far as possible, that all provisions of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of 1933 are enforced, including the provisions above described.

Senator DAVIS. Since the issuing of that order have any of the railroads discontinued any of their unfair practices?

Mr. BEYER. Yes; that is what I am leading to. I am just simply reciting that this was calling the attention on the part of the Coordinator to the carriers with respect to these unfair labor practices.

The coordinator then requested the carriers to fill out a questionnaire, which they are obliged to do under the act, and he requested them to do so under oath. The questionnaire was designed to develop the practices on the part of the carriers in respect to these prohibitions.

The result of that was that the Coordinator in due time, and as a result of this survey, which it happened to be my privilege to conduct, issued a subsequent order—not an order, because these are not orders, but these were sent out in his capacity soliciting the cooperation of the carriers to comply with the law—in his final request of the carriers, which, incidentally, was aside from the so-called regional coordinating function, he requested them to comply with seven suggestions.

I first would like to say this, before I list those seven suggestions, this survey developed this fact, and I am sure this will interest the committee as to what the practices are that have been indulged in, the things which have been invented for the purpose of circumventing the right on the part of the employees to organize, for the purpose of denying them their opportunity to constitute themselves into organizations of their own choice, and, if I may, I will read these into the record for the information of the committee or else I can have them incorporated by reference. Which would you prefer my doing?

The CHAIRMAN. Will it take long?

Mr. BEYER. It will not take long.

The CHAIRMAN: I think they ought to be read into the record.

Mr. BEYER. These are the 12 practices which we discovered as a result of the activities of the carriers in respect to labor matters that they have been indulging in:

(1) Carrier officers have participated in or supervised, directly or indirectly, the formation of, and carrier managements have retained a measure of control over, constitutions, bylaws, and other governing rules of organizations of their employees.

(2) Carrier officers have supervised, or taken part in prescribing, the rules governing nominations and elections or other methods of choice of the representatives, committees, and officers of such organizations.

(3) Carrier officers have participated and continue to participate in such election processes, at times taking charge of the count of ballots.

(4) Carriers contribute or have contributed financial support, both directly and indirectly, to company unions.

(5) Carriers pay or have paid, directly or indirectly, the salaries, wages, or expenses of officers, agents, representatives, and members of committees of company unions when exclusively engaged in the business of such company unions.

(6) Supervisors, officers, and agents of carriers participate or assist or have participated or assisted in the collection of dues, fees, and assessments of company unions.

(7) Carriers extend or have extended special privileges, such as group insurance, donations to relief funds, and the like, the benefits of which are confined exclusively to members of company unions.

(8) Officers, supervisors, and agents of carriers, by written and oral statements, address or have addressed employees with a view toward encouraging or advising them to join, or not to join, particular labor organizations, and attempt or have attempted to dissuade employees from joining other labor organizations and otherwise from exercising free choice in the selection of labor organizations or representatives.

(9) Carriers and their officers and supervisors assess or have assessed demerits, made reductions in pay, increased working hours, demoted, discharged, and otherwise victimized employees for failure to pay company union dues, or to remain members of company unions, for failure to join company unions, or for legally soliciting membership in or joining labor organizations other than company unions.

(10) Carrier officers solicit and maintain or have solicited and maintained lists of names of employees who are members of one labor organization or another, or who have or have not paid dues, these lists being used for the purpose of administering discipline, or otherwise influencing or coercing employees with respect to membership or nonmembership in labor organizations.

(11) Carrier officers deny or have denied wage differentials or other legitimate benefits, privileges, or opportunities incident to employment to certain employees, on account of membership or nonmembership in a labor organization.

(12) Carriers which have in the past required employees to sign a contract or agreement promising to join or not to join a labor organization have not notified the employees concerned by an appropriate order that such contracts have been discarded and are no longer binding on them in any way.

Carriers have in the past required employees to sign a contract or agreement promising to join or not to join a labor organization; in other words, a yellow-dog contract.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that complete the list?

Mr. BEYER. That completes the bill of particulars with respect to the practices which we have uncovered.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, may I inquire, are these evils or violations of the fair-labor practices general or isolated cases?

Mr. BEYER. They are not general. I am glad to say, on most railroads, and particularly with respect to certain classes of employees these labor practices do not hold. They are only with respect to certain classes of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. That was my impression.

Mr. BEYER. Yes; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Brotherhood organizations have been able to prevent those practices?

Mr. BEYER. Oh, yes; they have good so-called bona fide agreements with them and so have all of the other organizations in some cases and on some railroads, but on certain railroads the railroads have established company unions and have denied some classes of their employees the same privileges, if you want to put it that way, or have rather sought to prohibit some classes of their employees from enjoying the same privileges that other classes of their employees enjoy.

In all events, in the light of what that particular survey revealed, the Coordinator subsequently suggested to the carriers that they discontinue these various practices.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. BEYER. That was in December—comparatively recently.

The CHAIRMAN. December last? What response has been forthcoming?

Mr. BEYER. I think I can best answer that question by reading what the Coordinator himself has had to say on that score.

The CHAIRMAN. What are you reading from now?

Mr. BEYER. Senate Document No. 119, entitled "Regulation of Railroads."

The CHAIRMAN. That is his report?

Mr. BEYER. That is the Coordinator's first report.

The CHAIRMAN. To the Congress?

Mr. BEYER. To the Congress, yes. On page 61 he says:

The indications are that substantial progress has been made, and that further progress will be made, toward the correction of this situation. It will be closely watched and checked, however, by the section.

That is the section of labor relations.

If need for enforcement proceedings develops, and it appears that they will be hampered by ambiguities in the act, or by inadequate enforcement provisions, the Coordinator will ask Congress to correct these defects.

I want to say, however, that it has not been necessary thus far in the case of most carriers. This is not entirely true, and I do not want to give the impression that compliance has been by any means 100 percent, but I am glad to be able to say that as a result of the efforts which I have reviewed substantial progress has been made.

Senator WAGNER. That progress would not have been possible, would it, Mr. Beyer, if in the Emergency Act the practices had not been prohibited?

Mr. BEYER. Most decidedly not. Nobody would have been inclined to do anything about it. It simply took some agency on the part of the Government with respect to the railroads to watch the situation and police it and call the attention of all concerned to the practices which were being indulged in and then to inaugurate such action with the end of view of discouraging and otherwise bringing about compliance with the provision of the act.

I would like to stress on that very thing, if I may, the need for approaching the problem in a more or less general way which our experience seems to indicate as a desirable way of doing it. A good deal seems to depend upon how you go at these things, and I think the approach should be statesmanlike and cooperative. In other words, there is a lot of education necessary. There is a lot of prejudice that shoots through these things, and with the best will and intention I suppose a lot of things being said about the bill and against it and about and against these unfair labor practices, grow out of prejudices which are perhaps sincerely felt. Now, being a little bit more specific with respect to the bill—if this is not in order, I will not feel aggrieved if you check me.

The CHAIRMAN. You are perfectly in order.

Mr. BEYER. The point being that if I can be of any service it will be by confining myself as much as possible to specific words.

On page 5, line 10, the word "wages" is used. I think it would be better to use the words "rates of pay" rather than "wages", so that that particular line would read: "representatives concerning rates of pay, working, and other conditions of employment." The point about it is that wages are rather an indefinite thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you keep in "hours"?

Mr. BEYER. Oh, yes, I beg your pardon; "hours and other conditions of employment."

The CHAIRMAN. You would say, after "hours", "working and other conditions of employment"?

Mr. BEYER. "Working rules and other conditions of employment".

The CHAIRMAN. So that line 10 would read:

Representatives concerning rates of pay, hours, working rules and other conditions of employment?

Mr. BEYER. Yes. Incidentally, that is very much the language which is now in the Railway Labor Act and which has stood the test of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other suggestions?

Mr. BEYER. Section 5, the very first word at the top of the page, line 1:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer, or anyone acting in his interest, directly or indirectly—

Now, it has been our experience that it is not merely the manufacturer, which is a sort of a generic, broad item, but his officers and supervisors and the foremen who are the individuals who are oftentimes responsible. Take an employer who may have a change of heart, it takes a long time for that change of heart to filter down to the rank and file, to the supervisors, the foremen, or the superintendents. In other words, I believe the bill should bring out clearly and distinctly that it is not merely the employer or anyone acting in his interest, but also his specific agents, his officers, his supervisors, and his foremen who are liable under this act. In other words, they have got to be put on the spot if you want to bring about genuine compliance.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you would be more specific than the language "anyone acting in his interest"?

Senator BORAH. How would the bill read then?

Mr. BEYER. I would say that, "an employer, his officers, supervisors, agents, or anyone acting in his interest."

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. BEYER. I understand that in line 12 there has been some question about the wisdom of the continuance of the word "initiate". Frankly, I consider that word is very essential. In other words, if by some process the employer can do a lot of initiating of labor unions and things of that kind, we would be back again where we started; in other words, we would be placing a premium upon the employer taking the initiative with respect to bringing about the organization on the part of his employees.

Now, the proviso in line 25, which reads:

Provided, That where a contract or agreement of any kind is or shall be enforced between an employer and a group of employees, the provisions of such contract or agreement regarding conditions of employment shall not, because of anything contained in this paragraph, compel an employer to observe similar conditions of employment in his relations with all his employees—

I understood you to say, Senator Wagner, that you had in mind taking that out?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; unless you persuade me that it ought to stay in.

Mr. BEYER. No; that is not the point. The object there is to permit crafts under certain conditions to make agreements covering the craft. I believe that the same purpose would be accomplished by inserting a sentence in section 207 (a), cross this out and amend section 207 (a) somewhat as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. What page is that on, please?

Mr. BEYER. Section 207 (a) is page 18, line 22:

To provide that a majority of the employees of any employer unit, craft unit, or plant unit, or other appropriate grouping, shall have the right to determine who shall be the representatives of the unit concerned for the purpose of making and maintaining agreements.

The CHAIRMAN. Where would you place that, at the end of line 22?

Mr. BEYER. No, at the very beginning. I would say:

Section 207(a)—

And start right off—

The majority of the employees of any employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other appropriate group, shall have the right to determine who shall be the representatives of the unit concerned for the purpose of making and maintaining agreements.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would carry on?

Mr. BEYER. Then I would carry on.

The CHAIRMAN. With the rest of the section?

Mr. BEYER. More or less. You will have to change the language a little bit, but I think that will accomplish the same purpose.

Senator DAVIS. Do I understand, then, that on page 5, line 25, you would strike out that proviso?

Mr. BEYER. I would strike out the proviso——

Senator WAGNER. Beginning at the bottom of page 5. It is not needed with the language he just gave.

Senator DAVIS. I mean, you would strike that out?

Mr. BEYER. I would strike that out. Now, I have some reservations about the next proviso, for this reason. On page 6, beginning with line 7, it is not inconceivable to me that by that proviso you may forever thereafter establish so-called company unions in certain situations, and it is going to be exceedingly difficult—I would just like to give you this warning—no matter how many unfair labor practices you spell out in this act, you are not going to be very successful in catching the employer in bringing about company unions. There are various devices and ways of doing it.

Senator WAGNER. They have not been so very astute about it so far. It has been rather obvious.

Mr. BEYER. They will get more astute.

Senator WAGNER. The legal staff will invent other means for them.

Mr. BEYER. Yes, exactly; so that I would be somewhat afraid that if you maintain this proviso you would in some respects be providing an incentive, and certainly a temptation, to some employers to bring about company unions, as it were, in their particular situation, and you will have a hard time proving they have been responsible for starting the company unions.

The CHAIRMAN. You recommend to the committee that that proviso be eliminated?

Mr. BEYER. I would not want to say it should be eliminated, but rather consider it from the angle that I made. This thing goes a step further because it brings about a condition whereby all employees may be required to join.

Senator BORAH. You mean by that that that is a voluntary agreement and you would not want to include in the unit agreement.

Mr. BEYER. That is absolutely true. Now, I would like, if I may, to say a few words about the National Labor Board as it is proposed to be set up by the act.

It strikes me that the National Labor Board, as the act proposes to set it up, is to discharge three, if not four, separate functions. The first function is the so-called police function, to see to it, in other words, that these unfair labor practices are prohibited; secondly, it is to stand by as a board of mediation in the event mediation is invoked; thirdly, if both parties agree, it may serve as an arbitral tribunal; fourthly, it may serve in an administrative capacity in a way, for example, of conducting elections and doing things of that particular kind.

Well, it is my judgment, speaking very frankly, that it would be wiser not to mix up these functions. It would seem to me that the thing which should be aimed at with respect to the National Labor Board is to permit it or enable it to function somewhat as the custodian of the Government's conscience with respect to the rights of employees in industry, and to delegate the mediation function and the arbitration function to other agencies.

The mediation function, I believe, should be delegated purely and simply to the United States Conciliation Service, and the United States Conciliation Service should, in my estimation, be recognized in law and should be dignified in keeping with, for example, the United States Board of Mediation as it applies to the railroad industry.

Now, if there has been one thing which has made the success of the United States Railway Act and the United States Board ot Mediation, it is this, that the United States Board of Mediation at no stage of the game has ever been put in the position, or could be put in the position of taking sides in any dispute. It was purely and simply a mediation board, and both parties, as well as Congress, when the act was enacted, went very much out of its way to see to it that the Board of Mediation was not put in the position at any stage of the game of having to decide an issue. Otherwise, its mediation functions would become more or less undermined.

Now, with respect to arbitration, the United States Board of Mediation does not serve in an arbitral capacity. Instead, in the event the two parties cannot agree the United States Board of Mediation may propose arbitration and if arbitration is proposed than an arbitration board is set up in conformity with certain practices laid down in the act, and the only thing that the United States Board of Mediation has to do with respect to arbitration is in the event the two parties to the arbitration cannot agree to select the neutral arbitrator, or, as the case may be, one or two.

Now, it seems to me that that same practice should be observed in this particular situation. Certainly one thing is true, and it has got to be watched very, very carefully, that if the Board is exposed to all kinds of requests it may soon become overloaded and bogged down. I think Mr. Lewis made that observation with respect to this mediation.

Certainly, as far as the mediation function is concerned, the United States Conciliation Service, properly amplified and dignified in the law and otherwise, and properly manned, which, incidentally, is very, very essential, would, I think discharge that function very admirably.

Now, if the suggestions which I make are considered seriously, their practical effect would be something like this, that the National Labor Board would stand by as the custodian, as I said, of the Government's conscience with respect to the employees; it would do, in other words, what the Federal Coordinator has been doing in the railway industry.

In the railroad industry the United States Board of Mediation has been free to step in and mediate at any stage. The Federal Coordinator has not at any stage of the game interjected himself other than where he might have been called in jointly or otherwise in the capacity of mediator. That thing has been left purely and simply to the United States Board of Mediation.

Now, with respect to the matter of arbitration of disputes, if both parties can agree—and I believe the act should be amended so as to bring this about—if both parties can agree to arbitration I think it would be wiser to set up independent arbitration tribunals every time there is an arbitration forthcoming of a certain magnitude.

The United States Conciliation Service in that event can stand by, can facilitate arbitration, and can participate in the selection of neutrals when they are asked to do so and when it becomes necessary to do so.

Now, then, let us assume for the moment that the arbitration in any difficulty is rejected and that some difficulties threaten; then I would say that perhaps the National Labor Board should again be prepared to stand by to step into the picture in this way: Before a stoppage can result, before a lock-out can happen, it is my judgment that there should be a period of, say, 30 or 60 days in which the status quo is maintained, during which time if, in the opinion of the National Labor Board, a serious difficulty is threatened, resulting in strike, working a hardship, or otherwise interfering with interstate commerce, a fact-finding commission should be appointed by the Board, or else the Board sit as a fact-finding commission, and determine the merits of the issue and assign the responsibility and make those facts known.

That, in other words, is more or less again in keeping with the general experience of the Railway Labor Act.

The CHAIRMAN. This is after arbitration has failed?

Mr. BEYER. Not failed, but has been rejected. After arbitration is accepted the terms of the arbitration agreement would simply be that both parties would accept them for a certain period.

The CHAIRMAN. But if it is rejected and a strike threatened, you would suggest the Labor Board stepping in and doing what you have indicated?

Mr. BEYER. Yes; stepping in and issuing a proclamation to the effect that the status quo be maintained for a limited period pending which time it would determine what the merits of the issue were and who would be responsible in the event of a failure.

I believe that the United States Conciliation Service should, as I said before, be dignified in its position, that instead of having conciliators pure and simple we should have a conciliation board perhaps of three.

I also consider that the National Labor Board, instead of being a tripartite arrangement, should be constituted—I think for this purpose a body of three or five would be sufficient, but the gentlemen appointed to the Labor Board should be absolutely nonpartisan and not the representatives of labor, not the representatives of employee interests, but should be high-grade individuals appointed by the President with the approval of the Senate and should be men well versed in the whole art of appraising labor disputes, and, in other words, be the Supreme Court in a way of the labor judiciary; standing by on the one hand, to see to it that labor is safeguarded with respect to its right to organization, and so forth, and in the event of a breakdown to act as a fact-finding commission or else delegate that authority to a special committee which may be appointed from time to time as the need may arise.

Senator WAGNER. Would you keep the supervision of elections?

Mr. BEYER. Yes, decidedly. All of these administrative functions should be concentrated in the hands of the Labor Board. The Labor Board should have access up to a certain point to records for the purpose of enabling the intelligent conduct of an election. I would do that by all means.

That constitutes the burden of my observations and remarks.

Senator Wagner has asked this question and I, among others, will volunteer an answer: In the first place, there is absolutely nothing in this bill as drawn at the present time that prevents or prohibits any employee from choosing any kind of labor organization or company union or otherwise. Second, there is nothing in this act that gives any American Federation of Labor organization or any other kind of an organization a peculiar advantage. All that it does is to give the employees absolute freedom of choice to be safeguarded under Government supervision, and, as I say again, it is in keeping with the practices that have been recognized as sound and healthy in every other country apparently except this one.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Leiserson.

STATEMENT OF DR. WM. M. LEISERSON, NATIONAL AUTHORITY ON LABOR PROBLEMS, FORMERLY CHAIRMAN OF OHIO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION; AT PRESENT, CHAIRMAN PETROLEUM LABOR POLICY BOARD

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name, please.

Dr. LEISERSON. William M. Leiserson.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Dr. LEISERSON. Yellow Springs, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. You are listed here as chairman of the Ohio Unemployment Insurance Commission, and the present chairman of of the Petroleum Labor Policy Board. Is that correct?

Dr. LEISERSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume you have been interested in labor problems for some time?

Dr. LEISERSON. Yes. I am professor of economics at Antioch College. I have been engaged in arbitration work, in labor disputes, ever since the war. I began arbitrating disputes in the manufacture of army clothing, and I have stayed in it, more or less, since.

I have not very much to add to what Mr. Beyer has said, so I won't take very much of your time. I think Mr. Beyer has outlined the real problem that requires the enactment of this bill.

I want to explain the need for the bill from the point of view of an administrator who has to enforce section 7 (a). Before I became chairman of the Petroleum Labor Board, I acted as Secretary of the National Labor Board, and the problem of section 7 (a) were the main problems that came up.

Senator WAGNER. And they still are the main problems, professor?

Dr. LEISERSON. Yes.

Senator DAVIS. And, I might add, always will be.

Dr. LEISERSON. Yes. Well, of course, the problems of administration will always be there, but the need for the specific unfair labor practices provisions that are enumerated in section 5 were well explained by Mr. Beyer. If you have a law, such as the Emergency Transportation Act, which specifically makes certain things that may not be done in interfering with the employee's right to organize, makes them specifically illegal, then the law can be enforced. If, however, you leave the term general, the right to organize, and do not specifically prohibit the things that the administrator or the Coordinator of the Railroads are able to prohibit, then it is not possible for Congress' intent to be carried out, that labor should have the right to organize.

Now let me illustrate how that happened. As soon as section 7 (a) was adopted, industries that previously had objected to employee representation plans, that are otherwise called company unions, suddenly began to organize them. Now, there had been sincere advocates among the industries for many years of employee representation plans, but most of the industries that are now fighting the right of labor to organize opposed the formation of employee representation plans, for unions, on the ground, as they told their personnel managers, "What you are doing is organizing our employees, and the first thing you know they will go over to the union." And so they were as much opposed to company unions as they were to other unions.

As soon as section 7 (a) was adopted, the National Organization of Employers held conferences and worked out plans of employee representation and distributed them throughout the industry, and beginning with July those plans were imposed on the industry.

Now let me read you two or three things that they find essential in every one of those plans. Here is a typical plan, and it appears in practically all the employee representation plans. Here is one with regard to representatives of the employees:

> Any employee who, on the voting date, is at least of the age of 21 years; who is an American citizen, or who has secured his first papers for naturalization, and who has been in the active and exclusive continuous employ of the company for a period of at least 1 year, shall be eligible to serve as a representative of the employees in elections.

Now, no employee group, when they make up a plan of representation, will ever put that in. Now whether it ought to be in or ought not to be in is not a question. Congress did not so limit the right of representation. Congress said an employee who is 20 or 19 or 18 has a right to choose his representatives for collective bargaining, and did not say that he has to be 21. It did not say that he has to work for the company. The companies want that, and that is what is meant by the vague term "company union."

Collective bargaining means that the employees want to sell their labor cooperatively and not individually. It is cooperative marketing. Now, obviously if a thousand wage earners chip in together to market their labor cooperatively, they want a highly trained salesman to sell their labor, or they might want a highly trained statistician or economic expert, or a personnel manager, the way the companies do. But the companies insist that you cannot have a personnel manager, they say, "We are the only ones that have the right to have a personnel manager. You cannot have your own statistician. The only one that we will bargain with is a representative who works for us, that we can fire."

Senator DAVIS. It is the old story of the check weigher at the mine over and over again.

Dr. LEISERSON. Yes. That is the first thing. The next thing is the qualification of voters. The company plan says:

> All employees of the plant or company subdivision who, on the voting date, are at least 21 years of age and are in the active, regular, exclusive service of the company shall be eligible to vote.

Senator DAVIS. Aren't there many skilled mechanics who are 17, 18, and 19 years of age?

Dr. LEISERSON. Yes. It varies. It does not make any difference whether they are skilled. The semiskilled machine hands are mostly younger fellows, running from 18 to 21 and they make up the majority in the mechanized industry.

There is always in the plant an amendment provision, and the amendment provides this: "This plan may be amended or terminated by the council" which is a joint organization of employers and employees, "by a majority vote of all the duty elected employee representatives, together with the majority vote of all of the management representatives." In other words, if the management representatives object to the amendment, the employees' right is entirely taken away. The management-appointed representatives have the way with respect to changing anything that is in this plan. If, for instance, the employees should discover that they cannot bargain decently and fairly without an outside representative and they want to change the plan, amend it, to elect one, they can be stopped by the appointed representatives of the management not agreeing to it.

Now when you hear the talk about company unions, this is what is in mind: The companies prepare these plans, they put them in since July, and they claim, "This is the choice of our employees." Now technically I should say that if the employees prepare this kind of a plan, and this is what they want, I think under the law they have a right to have it. But it is quite a different thing for the companies to come in and prepare the plan. They send their personnel manager around to talk to the employees at the meeting. We have had cases where the employees wanted to stay home and not vote and the company would send trucks after them, making them come and vote for this plan under that kind of pressure.

Senator WAGNER. And, Doctor, isn't it also true that if the foreman comes along and says, "I want you to go over there and vote", the man knows if he does not his position would be in jeopardy. They have actually been discharged for that.

Dr. LEISERSON. If there were any sincere belief on the part of the employers who foster this plan that what they call the outside union was merely intimidating the employees, and that the employees prefer this kind of a plan, why, the employers would say to the National Labor Board, or to any other governmental agency, "For Heaven's sake, come in here and hold a secret election and let our employees vote without intimidation, so we can hold these elections without intimidation." The trouble is that the people who have imposed these plans on the employees know that if a secret election were held the plans would be repudiated.

Take the position of the automobile industry at the present time. They raised the question as to whether the whole issue is not a monopoly for the American Federation of Labor. A year ago there was a strike in the automobile plants in Detroit. It was run by an organization, a bona fide organization of employees known as the Mechanics' Educational Society. That organization was against the American Federation of Labor, and it was against the company union. It was an exercise of the right of the employees to choose their own organization. The employers who are now talking in New York about the American Federation of Labor bound themselves not to make an agreement with this independent organization that anti-American Federation of Labor, because what they did not want is the right of the employees to have the same rights that the employers have to sit in New York and decide what wages shall be paid in Detroit factories. They do not want the employees to be able to do what the Railroad Brotherhoods are doing here, to come down to Washington and have their conference and select their capable men to bargain for them.

That is the real issue. The issue is over section 7 (a). I would like to point out that the whole Recovery Program cannot operate with the employers given the monopoly right to fix wages, to combine to fix wages, without consulting the employees, without giving the employees the same right to parallel the employers' organization. Therefore you have to have in your bill, or in your law, as the emergency railroad law has, a list of things that the employers may not do, and the things that Mr. Beyer pointed out, that the administrator have the right to issue, the Coordinator of Railroads have the right to issue, and the Labor Board has to have the right to issue that same kind of a statement prohibiting those practices. It is questionable, at least, whether the Labor Board has that right now.

Now there are one or two things in addition to Mr. Beyer's statement that need to be pointed out. There was a witness here a few days ago who called the attention of your committee to subsection (2) of section 5.

Senator DAVIS. What page is that?

Dr. LEISERSON. Page 5. He thought that the first part of that section is all right, but the second part, which says, "or to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives", and so on, he thought that that is impractical and would not work. That is copied from the Railway Labor Act, where it has been in since 1926, and the Railway Labor Act was constructed by the management of the railroads and the Railroad Brotherhoods together, and they brought it down to Congress. They knew that if you gave the right to labor to organize and you did not have a corresponding obligation of the employer to deal with that entity, that it would mean nothing at all. Again and again the employer says, "All right, we will meet their representative", and they meet him and say, "We cannot agree to anything."

Senator WAGNER. That actually came up in the National Labor Board. We are not talking about fictitious things.

Dr. LEISERSON. No; that happened almost every day. They say, "We are always ready to meet our employees, or their representatives, or any groups of them", and they think as the law reads now that is all they are required to do. But in the Railway Labor Act it says, "It shall be the duty of all carriers, their agents", and so on, "to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements concerning rates of pay, rules and working conditions, and to settle all disputes", and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give us that citation?

Dr. LEISERSON. That is section 2 of the Railway Labor Act, that was adopted by the Sixty-ninth Congress, No. 257, H.R. 9463.

Now, I think it is exceedingly important that it should stay in the bill it should not be thrown out on the theory, "Well, you cannot enforce that anyway." If we can say, if the administrators of the law can say to an employer, "Now you really haven't tried to agree with them, so that we will avoid a strike. They have elected their representatives. Now sit down and make an earnest effort, the way the laws says." You will avoid many disputes in that way.

Senator WAGNER. Before you leave that subject, I might call attention to some testimony in this way automobile situation which was adduced on the same question. I asked the representative who had been selected by the company union whether he had anything to do, together with the other representatives, in the fixation of the wages that were being paid, and he said no. I asked him if he and his committee had ever attempted to negotiate a collective bargaining agreement on behalf of the workers, and he said no.

Dr. LEISERSON. Usually they do not. They merely elect representatives in this way. Of course the employee representative whose job depends on the employer, especially at a time like this, with so many people out of work, he isn't going to talk to the employer like a high-powered salesman, nor is he going to talk to him like the wage experts and personnel experts, outsiders, who do not belong to the industry at all. They go to colleges and hire psychologists as personnel managers to deal with the ordinary workman, then they turn around and say, "You workmen are not allowed to hire a fellow like we hire, to bargain with us. We do not think we want it. We think it will give somebody a monopoly of labor if you do that sort of thing."

Now the next thing, subsection (3) says the employers shall be prohibited "To initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, bylaws", and so on. Now that is absolutely necessary because of what I have just shown you here in this plan. There was a conference at Princeton University this last summer where the personnel managers of the largest industries got together for what, in my judgment, was to work out plans for circumventing this law. I was there at the meeting and I questioned the morals of that kind of a meeting. Can these people get together to work out a form of representation and then spread it throughout the country, impose it on the employees, and then publish statistics about the growth of employee representation plans? But they answered me, and they were sincere in their answer, that "The law gives us the right to educate our employees. It does not prohibit it. We are merely trying to assist them."

Now unless you put this in, to prohibit any such activity, you cannot expect common wage earners, who are not college men, to compete with these trained executives, hired by the companies at high salaries, in having their rights protected, and it is that lack of protection of right that causes disputes, strikes, and unrest; it is that kind of unfair dealing and not some outsider.

I have not found anywhere where an employer said to the employee, "You go ahead and organize your own union. Call in the A. F. of L. fellows, call in the company union fellows, call in anybody, it is none of my business; you go ahead and organize your own union", I haven't found in any such places any great unrest. The employees have sometimes joined A. F. of L. unions, sometimes voted down A. F. of L. unions, and set up their independent unions, but it was their own and the purpose of this law is to see that they have that.

Senator DAVIS. Doctor, have you got any suggestions as to the language to be used in this particular section?

Dr. LEISERSON. I think on the whole the language here is all right. I think you might leave the word "policies" out, for instance. An employer might want to discuss with an employees' organization, policies, and the question might arise. But I don't think that is particularly important. As it stands employers should not be permitted, or any of their agents, to initiate or participate in or supervise in the formation of the constitution, bylaws, and governing rules. Just how would the employer like it if the A. F. of L. or the Railroad Brotherhoods insisted that the trade associations that they belonged to shall have a certain constitutional provision that the unions insist on? They would say, "It is rotten, it is unfair, it is none of your business." Certainly it is none of the employers' business as to what kind of constitution the employees have for their own organization.

I agree also that that proviso about discrimination, beginning on the twenty-fifth line, ought to go out.

Now one thing about the constitution of the board. Mr. Beyer pointed out, what is a very important thing, that this board would have to enforce a law; therefore, the suggestion that the board have partisan representation on it, from the point of view of half labor and half capital, with an impartial chairman, is essentially wrong from an administrative point of view. If the law is to be enforced, the person has to represent the Government only. He is sworn to see that the law is enforced. Now when you have a bipartisan board enforcing a law, they cannot get away from the idea that they have been fighting it out in Congress, to see what should get into this law. Now you know how they fought on section 7 (a). The same people that were fighting on that will get into the bipartisan board to administer the law, with the result that they will continue their scraps that presumably were settled by Congress, and the result is that you will get a confused enforcement of the law, and there will often be a compromise on how far they will go in enforcing the law.

Senator DAVIS. Wasn't that the trouble with the old Railroad Labor Board?

Dr. LEISERSON. That is why the old Railroad Labor Board collapsed.

Senator DAVIS. That is right.

Dr. LEISERSON. Therefore I think it is a mistake. Now it may be all right to put on advisory boards of employer and employee representatives, of employer and employee organizations, for the purpose of informing the Government officials on detail problems in various industries, to sit as advisory members from time to time, but to put the enforcement of the law into a bipartisan board, is, in my judgment, a very serious mistake from an administrative point of view.

On the other hand, this same board is going to have functions of conciliation, arbitration, the administrative machinery of election. That is part of the enforcement. It belongs together. They may have elections, sometimes they may have to certify these employees. If there is a strike in a plant where a thousand people are working and 900 go out, you do not have to have an election to determine what the 900 want. They are telling you. It is silly to go through the election business then.

Now, I do not quite agree with Mr. Beyer's suggestion that all of the conciliation work should be thrown back to the Department of Labor, and that the board should have no conciliation function. I think the United States Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor needs to be strengthened, and most of the smaller disputes that come to the National Labor Board should be handled by them in the first instance.

There are hundreds of small disputes where a conciliator goes out, and he can settle them without any trouble. But when a big dispute comes along, it is not on the enforcement of the law, it is a dispute over and above the law, you need to have, in that case, the next step after the conciliator fails, because the job is too big. At that point the prestige of a national board, in my judgment, might well be enlarged this way: You have three members, then have the Secretary of Labor and Secretary of Commerce as ex-officio members, because this isn't the Labor Department work, this isn't the Department of Commerce work, it is where the two get together, and this national Board, with its prestige, can have examiners to hear cases, or their own members can act as examiners, or themselves act as conciliating bodies, in the bigger disputes.

Now only one thing more in conclusion, and that is with respect to the absolute need for this law, especially the provisions of section 5, having to do with the unfair practices, the absolute need for that in the recovery program, if it is going to succeed. The recovery program gives the right——

Senator DAVIS. Will you make the first part of your statement again, Doctor?

Dr. LEISERSON. All right. In conclusion I want to point out the absolute need for the enactment of this act, especially of section 5, that is the one prohibiting unfair labor practices—and while I am on that, there ought to be one more thing: Prohibiting the use of spies in labor disputes.

You will find the codes have a provision, many of them, the steel code, particularly, has a provision that no member of the code shall employ anybody to get secrets from a competitor. The Secretary of Labor very properly pointed out at the public hearing on that code that employers will use spies to get business secrets from each other; they will not hesitate to use spies in labor organizations. And there is nothing that causes unrest so much as when I, a workman at my bench, do not know whether the other fellow at the next bench is a spy employed by the employer. That is an unfair practice, whether it is labor or business, and you might well include that with the list of unfair practices.

Now the code gives the right to competing employers to get together and make rules of fair competition, which include price-fixing in many cases.

Now there are two great dangers. One is that they will have a monopoly, they will make a monopolistic rule. So the law specifically prohibits monopolistic rules with respect to pricing. But when employers get together they also make monopolistic rules with respect to wages, they decide what the wages shall be among themselves, they bind themselves not to pay anything else, and then turn around and say, "We will not recognize an organization of the employees." They say, "They must compete with us individually." And all the cutthroat competition is good when it comes to labor.

Now look what the Government does. This is Bulletin No. 7 of the National Recovery Administration Manual for the Adjustment of Complaints, and on page 4 the Government tells the world, "It is the policy of N.R.A. to build up and strengthen trade associations"; that is, trade unions of employers. If anybody wrote that it is the policy of the Government to build up trade unions, that fellow would lose his job right away. As if there was something wicked about building up a trade union? "It is the policy of the Government to build up and to strengthen trade associations", which means trade unions of employers, "throughout all commerce and industry." In other words, to set up a monopoly like the automobile members say the A. F. of L. is a monopoly, through all commerce and industry, you are going to have trade unions of employers so that they may perform all code administrative functions, they may get together and act as a unit.

Now it is well to recall what that canny Scotchman, Adam Smith, said, that "We must never let either employers or laborers combine", he said, "for it is well known that when business men get together, even for merriment and diversion, the conversation soon turns to prices and ends in a conspiracy against the public." I think there is a great deal of truth in that statement. On the other hand, we cannot get along nowadays with that kind of a suspicious attitude, either toward business or toward labor. We cannot have the kind of competition that Adam Smith wanted, the cutthroat, raw, he-man competition that he wanted. We have got to have regulated control of competition, and the Government properly so provides. Then it goes on to say, "A trade association division has been established in N.R.A. to carry out this policy and to advise and assist industry in the performance of these functions." The Government spending the taxpayers' money to help organize trade unions of employers.

Now the law specifically contemplates that the Government will do the same for labor, and we seem to forget that there is a section 7 (b) in the National Recovery Act.

Senator DAVIS. What is the number of the Government bulletin that you read?

Dr. LEISERSON. That is no. 7, Manual for the Adjustment of Complaints, of the N.R.A.

Now, section 7 (b) of the National Industrial Recovery Act instructs the President to exert his efforts—and by the President, of course it means the Administrators under him—to help employers and employees to arrange collective bargains and make agreements. Now, that was the purpose of it. Now, the employers come along and brazenly tell you, "We will not deal with any organization of our employees. We will not recognize their right to an association and to deal with that association as an entity", when the law contemplates it. Now, if you tell them that they are violating the law on that point, they say, "No; there is nothing in here that requires us to negotiate an agreement." Therefore, you have got to have this provision in the act, that they must exert every effort.

There is nothing to prevent us from doing these other things, therefore you have to put these lists of unfair, prohibited practices into a law, and if you do not, I think the danger to the whole program of National Recovery is that you will not have industrial self-government. The theory of industrial self-government, as I have tried to explain to employers, is, "You have a right to govern yourselves, but doesn't the law give the employees the same right to govern themselves and make rules of fair competition among themselves?" "Oh, no; the law does not do that", they say.

Now, it seems to me, unless you put that in, you are making it possible for the employers of the country to organize nationally into automobile chambers of commerce, into steel institutes, into various organizations, to dictate collectively wages to individuals who must, of necessity, bargain against each other in a cut-throat way; and then they may organize themselves into a national industrial conference board, or chamber of commerce, or anything, and these must be recognized, but they will not stand for the same right to labor.

If you want anything more calculated to bring unrest, disorder, discontent, and failure of the whole program than that, I do not know how you can figure anything out better than that. You have the chance here to stop that and make the National Recovery Act operate by explaining that this section 5 of the unfair practices, that section 7 (a) was meant to give the employees exactly the same rights that the employers have.

Senator DAVIS. Doctor, what would you think of having a division of conciliation and arbitration for the transportation industry in the Department of Labor, and the Railway Labor Board come under that with the supervision of this particular board that is now in this Wagner bill?

Dr. LEISERSON. Well, I haven't given any thought to the matter. It might be desirable to unify those things, I don't know

Senator DAVIS. That would mean one board, then.

Dr. LEISERSON. It might be too much for one board. It is almost too much for the National Labor Board, as it is, when you have so many industries to deal with.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you considered whether or not this bill ought to be restricted to businesses where there is a limited number of employees?

Dr. LEISERSON. How do you mean "a limited number"?

The CHAIRMAN. One of the criticisms made to the bill was that it applies to a man who has one employee.

Senator WAGNER. No; it is 10.

Dr. LEISERSON. You cannot have collective bargaining very well where there is only one employee.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner suggests it is 10 employees.

Dr. LEISERSON. Well, of course I did not know about that. You might want to make an exception, but I would not except the small plant. We have a notion that the big problems of labor and the meanness of the relation between employer and employee comes only in the large plant, when the small employer knows every man by his first name. Yes; but what names does he call them? In handling labor disputes, you have more difficulty, more serious difficulties in smaller plants where the personalities enter into it, and where you have not the standard labor practices, than in the larger plants. You might want to except a small farmer with a few employees, but you certainly would not want to except him in a situation like the one you have out in the Imperial Valley now, with a great number of people working in agricultural employment.

The CHAIRMAN. As the bill is drafted, there is no limitation at all.

Dr. LEISERSON. There might be an exception made in certain cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner's impression was it was limited to 10. Your answer to my question is you would apply the principles of this bill to the small employer as well as the larger or big employer?

Dr. LEISERSON. Yes; but I would say where 1, 3, or 5 employees were employed, perhaps 10, you might take it out, but in the main I would not except the small employer, what is ordinarily known as a small employer.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you for your presentation. Is Mr. Witte here?

Mr. WITTE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Witte, could you come tomorrow morning?

Mr. WITTE. Unfortunately, I have got to get back to Madison.

The CHAIRMAN. How long will you take?

Mr. WITTE. I will make it very short.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

STATEMENT OF EDWIN E. WITTE, LABOR EXPERT, PROFESSOR OF ECONOMICS, UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name, please?

Mr. WITTE. Edwin E. Witte, professor of economics at the Univeristy of Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. You live at Madison, Wis.?

Mr. WITTE. I live at Madison, Wis.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been a professor of economics at the University of Wisconsin?

Mr. WITTE. Well, I have been connected with the university since 1920, but I was chief of the Wisconsin Legislative Library; secretary of the industrial commission, before that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you succeed Mr. McCarthy?

Mr. WITTE. I did; yes, sir.

Because of the lateness of the hour, I will not go into the arguments at all as to why I am appearing in support of this bill. I only want to say that there evidently is a very great misunderstanding of the provisions of the bill. I was approached by a Wisconsin employer on Saturday when I left, in regard to this bill. The impression seems to be that this bill somehow outlaws plants unions. Of course it does nothing of the kind. The impression seems to be it establishes a compulsory closed shop. It does nothing of the kind. It legalizes voluntary closed shop agreements. Every local of every State in the Union, including even the State of Massachusetts, where the law has been pretty restrictive on activities of labor unions, the voluntary agreement for the closed shop is legal, even in Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is comprehensive and broad, it is liberal in its legislation for the improvement of labor conditions generally.

Mr. WITTE. I certainly would acknowledge that, Senator. Of course it does not give the American Federation of Labor domination of industry. The very people that make that claim are also calling attention to the fact that only 10 percent of all employees are in the American Federation of Labor, and the situation, as I see it, is much more likely to be a situation in which the American Federation of Labor unions will be unable to function in many of the major industries of the country, unless legislation of this kind is enacted. It means not the domination of the American Federation of Labor, but giving the American Federation of Labor unions a chance.

As I see it, the essential provisions of the bill are just three: Recognition of collective bargaining, and the corresponding duty of the employers to try to arrive at agreements; second, the employers are not to interfere with labor in self-organization; and, finally, it sets up machinery for the interpretation and enforcement of these provisions.

The employers, as Dr. Leiserson well stated, are insisting on free self-regulation in industry, and yet, illogically, they would not permit self-organization on the part of the employees. I endorce every statement that has been made here by Dr. Leiserson, and wish to be recorded strongly in support of this bill.

What I mainly wish to do is to call attention to certain amendments that have not been brought to your attention before, that I I think should be inserted in this bill. The major amendment that I would suggest, I would insert on page 23, section 304, and the purpose of the amendment or suggestion is to prevent the employers who have set up company-dominated unions from barring elections or from claiming that elections are barred. In paragraph (b) you say:

> Any term of a contract or agreement of any kind which conflicts with the provisions of this Act is hereby abrogated, and every employer who is a party to such contract or agreement shall immediately so notify his employees by appropriate action.

I submit that in practically all cases there are no contracts or agreements. That hasn't been what company unionism has meant. Company unionism has not culminated in agreements at all. It certainly is doubtful whether this is effective in barring, what appeared to me to be the plain violation of the intent of section 7 (a), from being now made a permanent bar against labor organizations. I suggest, consequently, an insertion of a new paragraph, something like this:

> (c) Any election on the adoption of any employee representation plan or for the election of representatives of the employees for purposes of collective bargaining held subsequent to June 16, 1933—

I am inserting that date. That is the date of the Industrial Recovery Act, when section 7 became effective—> and prior to the effective date of this Act in relation to which the employer was guilty of any of the unfair labor practices specified in subsections (3) and (4) of this Act, shall not be binding, but the National Labor Board shall have authority to ascertain the wishes of the employees as to collective bargaining and the selection of representatives as provided in section 207.

That is to determine the wishes of employees in the relation of collective bargaining and in the selection of representatives.

With the very phenomenal development of the so-called "company" unions since section 7 (a) was enacted, there is grave danger that section 7 (a) will become the greatest travesty on labor that has ever existed, if these arrangements are now, in a sense, validated and no provision is made expressly abrogating them.

Next I want to raise another point which to me is very essential, and that relates to the question of whether section 5, as it stands, covers the situation that is most prevalent in this whole field of company unionism, that loose organization, if you can call it an organization, that has no members, no dues, that is merely a method of electing representatives. I call your attention to the fact that in subsection (5) of section 3, the definition of labor organizations, you speak of the term "labor organization" as meaning—> any organization, labor union, association, corporation or society of any kind, in which the employees participate to any degree whatsoever, which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, or hours of employment.

I am not certain that that includes what is known as the "employee representation" committee, which is the most prevalent form of company union. There are two forms of company unions, the employee association and the employee representation committee, a mere election of representatives, no organization whatsoever, and, of course, no dues. I am not at all sure that the employee representation committee is covered. That doubt arises further because in other places in this act you distinguish between labor organizations and representatives, you distinguish in subsection (4) of section 3, "The term 'representatives' includes any individual or labor organization", evidently referring to these employee representation committees.

Now, in section 4 on page 4, you say, "Employees shall have the right to organize and join labor organization, and to engage in concerted activities, either in labor organizations or otherwise." You imply that there is something besides a labor organization that engages in these collective activities.

Similarly, in subsection (2) of section 5, you speak only of representatives of the employees, and I submit that there is danger that your language does not include this most prevalent form of company unionism that we now know, the employee representation committee.

Senator WAGNER. Will you suggest the word which ought to be added there?

Mr. WITTE. I am suggesting two alternatives, Senator. In the definition of "labor organization", at the end, you could insert the words:

This term shall include every plan for the selection of employee representatives for purposes of collective bargaining, although there is no definite organization of employees.

Or, preferably, this is my own preference, my own preference would be to distinguish between labor organizations and employee representation committees. I think it is strained language that calls an employee representation committee an organization of any kind, and the sections I have called your attention to do not so call it. They refer to it as something else besides an organization. I would define an employee representation committee something in this fashion:

The term "employee representation committee" means any committee or group of representatives of employees not a labor organization, who are elected to confer with the employer or representatives of the employer concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, or hours of employment.

If that alternative were adopted you would have to insert in subsections (3) and (4) on page 5, following "labor organization", the words, "or employee representation committee", which I think is really what this is. It is not a labor organization at all, and it is a confusion of terms to define it as such.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a frequent agency designed for employees?

Mr. WITTE. That is the principal agency of company unionism. The employee association type of company union is very, very rare, and practically all of the new company unions that have been started since the National Industrial Recovery Act was passed, are not unions in any proper sense of the term at all, they are loose plans for the election of representatives only.

The CHAIRMAN. And this language embraces them?

Mr. WITTE. I think so. That is why I am submitting it, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WITTE. My final point, I endorse some of the amendments suggested here before, but I am calling attention to some that have not been, perhaps, brought to your attention. I am concerned with this question of majority representation that is raised now in the automobile difficulty, and it has been raised in other concerns. As I understand it, this is what the automobile man says, "We will deal with the representatives of those of our employees who want to join the labor union, but we must have a list of those employees."

The CHAIRMAN. Any labor union?

Mr. WITTE. Any labor union. "We will deal with those of our employees who wish to deal through these company unions, we will deal with them through the company unions." They do not say they will deal with the Communist unions, but I presume that is inferred too. "We will deal individually with such employees." They want to deal individually, rather than collectively. Now, that may, at first blush, seem a fair position, but I submit, gentlemen, that exactly parallels the situation which would prevail, if, instead of you gentlemen here representing your respective States, all of the people who voted for your opponents were represented by them, and if, for each of you, instead of you all being here, all of your opponents here were representing the people that particularly preferred them.

Moreover, this is not even quite parallel to that. This says, "You want to all meet together. We will meet one group here; we will meet another group here; we will draw bargains with each group." In industrial government, just as in political government, there has to be majority rule, when it comes to actual government. The only type of representation that individuals can have is the right of petition. The right of petition, the right to lay grievances before Congress is a right that any individual and every group must have. Similarly, in industrial government, the right of petition, the right to lay grievances before the employer seems to me is a right that every group should be accorded, and every individual. As a matter of fact, that is all the employers that are promoting the company unions have in mind. They only have the right to petition in mind; they do not have the collective bargaining in mind, in the sense of making laws for the industry through the joint action of employer and employee. That is not contemplated at all. What is contemplated is merely a right to present a point of view.

That is proper, but if it comes to determining conditions of employment by making some kind of rules of governing wages and hours, there obviously has to be a determination on the basis of majority rule, or you have pure anarchy, just as you would have in government.

To meet that situation, I suggest a possible change in subsection (2) of section 5. I would split that section into two parts. In section (a) I would make it an unfair labor practice to refuse to recognize representatives of any group of his employees who have not been duly selected by them to take up with the employer any grievance or any matter concerning their employment.

It certainly is placing no burden on the employer to meet with representatives of any group of employees that have a grievance or wish to take up some matter with him, but obviously he cannot bargain with every group of employees or with individuals. There cannot be any sort of industrial government whatsoever under those conditions. Consequently I would insert:

(b) To refuse to make every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with representatives of a majority of his employees concerning wages, hours, and conditions of employment.

With that I would amend section 207 on pages 18 and 19, something as Mr. Beyer suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give us the language there?

Mr. WITTE. Possibly Mr. Beyer's language was preferable to mine, but I would insert in lines 22 and 23, I would substitute for the word "are" the words "should be recognized as" and I would insert before the word "employees" the words "a majority of the employees."

In any dispute as to who should be recognized as the representatives of the majority of the employees, the Board is to have the deciding voice.

I would leave this in the bill the way it stands, that the Board may determine whether the proper method of representation is the employer unit, the craft unit, the plant unit, the industry unit, or any other appropriate grouping. But in any event, if a bargain is made, if you have in mind making some form of industrial government you must recognize that there cannot be bargaining unless you recognize that fundamental principle of democracy, majority rule.

Because of the lateness of the hour, I won't add anything further, except I want to endorse what Dr. Leiserson said with reference to adding a section to bar the spy. I call your attention to the fact that the spy system in industry, the industrial espionage is unquestionably widely prevalent, probably not quite so prevalent as it was following the World War, but it is again being revived on a very large scale, and the industrial espionage is a practice that business frowns on in connection with business competition, and it certainly is a practice which promotes violence, it promotes unrest, which is indefensible. I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you. Is Mr. William J. Long present?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you are here with seven others of the Weirton Steel Co. workers, that you are in the city on some other mission than attending this hearing, but that you desire to be heard by this committee. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you come forward, please? Will you be satisfied, if we refrain from attendance in the Senate and give you time to be heard?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM J. LONG, PRESIDENT WEIR COVE LODGE, NO. 30, AMALGAMATED ASSOCIATION OF IRON, STEEL, AND TIN WORKERS

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name?

Mr. LONG. William J. Long.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. LONG. Weirton, W.Va.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was your employer?

Mr. LONG. The Weirton Steel Co., a subsidiary of the National Steel Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the particular work that you do?
Mr. LONG. I am a tin plate roller by trade.
The CHAIRMAN. You have six other representatives with you?
Mr. LONG. Yes, seven.
The CHAIRMAN. Seven altogether?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. What are you here for?
Mr. LONG. We are here, Senator, for one thing, to find out why our case, the case we had before Senator Wagner's Labor Board, the Labor Board that Senator Wagner is Chairman of, why it is being delayed.
The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you had hearings because of some difficulty you had with the company, some difficulty between your employer and his employees?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Before Senator Wagner's labor board?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. And the decision has not yet been made?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
Senator WAGNER. Oh, yes; it has.
The CHAIRMAN. The decision has been made and you want to find out why the order of the board has not been enforced?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
Senator WAGNER. The matter is now before the Attorney General.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you had a strike at your plant?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How long ago was that?
Mr. LONG. It terminated on October 16; it began on September 24.
The CHAIRMAN. Are the men working at the plant now?
Mr. LONG. Yes; all but about 600 that are on the streets today, who are victimized through the company union domination.
Senator WAGNER. You went back at the request of the Labor Board when it rendered the decision?
Mr. LONG. Yes; when they signed an agreement.
Senator WAGNER. You terminated the strike?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How many are there employed at that plant?
Mr. LONG. Approximately 13,000 in the three plants, together with 5,000 in Ecorse, Mich. We have an organization there.
The CHAIRMAN. What is the nature of the organization that you belong to?
Mr. LONG. Well, Senator, the organization we belong to is an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor.
The CHAIRMAN. It is a trade union?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How many members have you in it?
Mr. LONG. In Weirton, approximately close to 9,000.
The CHAIRMAN. Out of a total employment of how many?
Mr. LONG. Nine thousand nine hundred and fifty.
The CHAIRMAN. Nine thousand nine hundred and fifty now?
Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed to present to us any memo that you have.
Senator WAGNER. There is also a company union, is there not?
Mr. LONG. I practically grew up in the steel mills and am employed there today. I am a tin-plate roller by trade. It has never been our privilege, in a period of over 23 years that I have worked for the Weirton Steel Co., approximately consecutively for 23 years, that we could exercise our rights in any manner whatsoever, so as to choose representation.

In 1913 I was just a youngster in the mills, but I remember it clearly, the Weirton Steel Co. bought what is known as the Pope Tin Plate Co., in Steubenville, Ohio. The Pope Tin Plate Co. at that time signed an agreement with the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. Upon taking over this plant they refused to sign a contract with the proper representatives of this organization. These men went out on a strike and tried to get Weirton to go out with them. We were clubbed by professional thugs and gunmen. The president of the Steel Co., J. C. Williams, himself rode around high, wide, and handsome in an open touring car, with a machine gun and a submachine gun, and highpowered rifles at his command, all through the town, up and down there, intimidating the men. So we could not have the preference of joining the organization. They were intimidating and coercing us in the place there. We could not have any organization representing us.

Again, in 1920, when the National Steel strike was on, they tried to organize Weirton and they met with the same results. The plant then went on a strike for a period of 3 weeks, and they met with the same results again. They were clubbed and beaten into submission. The strike, I think, lasted approximately 3 weeks.

There has never been any representation there. The men never had a voice in the only thing that they had to sell. That is, I am speaking of the practical workman. They never had a voice. The only thing they had to sell was their labor. They have never had any voice whatsoever in any manner.

Upon the employers of the Weirton Steel Co. becoming acquainted with the fact that the National Recovery Act provided in section 7 (a) that labor had the right to organize under governmental supervision and protection, the employers of the three plants, one in Weirton, W.Va., one in Steubenville, Ohio, and 1 in Clarksburg, together with the National Steel Co., which was a subsidiary, and of course the Michigan plant—we had a total membership of approximately 8,012 signed members——

The CHAIRMAN. In all these plants?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; at that particular time. That is, I am not speaking of the Ecorse, Mich., plant, I am speaking specifically of the Weirton situation. The company insisted that we deal with a plan that they had put into effect in June 1933, known as the employees' representation plan. I believe Senator Wagner has a copy of the book. It is nothing more or nothing less than a plan that was adopted by the Whitaker-Glesner Co., known now as the Wheeling Steel Corporation. They merely took that plan and had duplicate copies made of it, and put the Weirton Steel Co.'s name in the front of the book.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time was there an existing trade union organization at your plant?

Mr. LONG. We were in the process of organizing.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not organized? You were in the process of organizing?

Mr. LONG. We were approximately organized at that time, Senator, we were 75 percent organized.

The CHAIRMAN. How long before that had you been organized?

Mr. LONG. We started in April, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You were really in the process of organization, you had not had the year before or so, or for some years back, any organization?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So up to this time, you were an unorganized group of workmen.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were in the process of organizing this trade union when this plan was suggested to you by your employers?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Mr. LONG. They put the plan into effect in the early part of June. The foremen came around and instructed the rollers—I have 900 men under me, there are 26 mills there, each mill is composed of 3 crews to the number of 27 men, that is the rollers, with 3 in charge on these different shifts—instructing the rollers that they should have their men go and vote for representatives on this plan; this agreement.

Senator WAGNER. Did they distribute the constitution?

Mr. LONG. Yes, they distributed the constitution. They selected the members——

The CHAIRMAN. Who do you mean by "they"?

Mr. LONG. The company.

Senator WAGNER. The management.

The CHAIRMAN. The superintendents?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; the various foremen, together with the hot mill superintendent.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. You had no mass meeting in which you formed your own constitution?

Mr. LONG. We had nothing. They laid the plan on the table and says, "Take it. Here it is."

The CHAIRMAN. You assume they had knowledge at this time of the activities of the groups of employees forming a trade union?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; they were thoroughly familiar with it.

The CHAIRMAN. When this plan was proposed, what did the employees do about it?

Mr. LONG. When the plan was proposed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, I mean by the employers.

Mr. LONG. There was a small majority, Senator, that took it rather seriously, thinking that in some way it would be beneficial to them, but the majority of men who were familiar with what had taken place in the Wheeling Steel Corporation, with the plan that they had in effect there, they knew that it did not benefit them in any way whatsoever, and these men in Weirton who were familiar with that just disregarded it. Many of them were merely what you might call "wooden" men when it came to voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there a meeting held?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The employees never accepted the idea?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They never accepted the idea of a company union?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then how did the management of the company respond when they discovered the employees were not accepting the suggestion?

Mr. LONG. Well, they insisted on putting it through. They posted a notice. Senator Wagner, I believe, has a copy of the notice. They posted a notice to the effect that this company had this plan in effect and we must accept it and they would not bargain with any other group.

The CHAIRMAN. Had anybody started any bargaining with them up to this time?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your union men were starting to bargain with them?

Mr. LONG. We tried to; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So that they knew that an effort was being made by the representatives of the trade union that had organized the plant, to deal with them for bargaining purposes, and they refused to do it?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And they posted a notice saying the only way they would deal with the men was through this company plan?

Mr. LONG. Through this plan they had in effect.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened next?

Mr. LONG. Through their insistence that we deal through this plan, knowing that we had our organization approximately 85 percent then, we rejected it.

The CHAIRMAN. Your organization rejected their suggestion?

Mr. LONG. Yes; the employees who had accepted our organization as their representation. There were efforts made to deal with them through the company representative plan, or the employees representative plan.

The CHAIRMAN. How far did you get with that attempt at representation?

Mr. LONG. We sent a man out on a small grievance that we had there, and the general manager, together with the tin plate mill manager, says, "Now, listen, you have to forget this. Remember how good we have been to you here. You will get nothing in years."

The CHAIRMAN. This was the attempt of the representatives of your union?

Mr. LONG. No, sir; this was a company representative.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought you said you never had a company union meeting.

Mr. LONG. We did not, sir. This was the committee meeting, you understand, Senator, with one individual going out there on a matter of a small grievance.

Senator WAGNER. Maybe there is one thing he did not explain. After the constitution was 'istributed, you were told to go up and vote, were you?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you vote?

Mr. LONG. I did not; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of the men vote? Did they select some representatives?

Mr. LONG. They did; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And did they attempt to have a conference with their employers?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With what success?

Mr. LONG. No success. They would not allow us to have a voice in the matter at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Why?

Mr. LONG. Because they would never allow us to congregate in a mass form to present our grievances.

The CHAIRMAN. These representatives now were apparently, on the face of it, men chosen as the result of a company's effort to establish a company union, am I correct?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They would not deal with them?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now what happened next?

Mr. LONG. We then had a grievance which was known as the "opening department", which led to a strike in the opening department.

The CHAIRMAN. You had a strike in the opening department?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was over conditions of work, nothing over unions?

Mr. LONG. Over conditions of work and wages.

The CHAIRMAN. You struck because there was nobody to go and speak for you, no representatives?

Mr. LONG. There were approximately 300 men went out on strike.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened then?

Mr. LONG. They made an effort to arbitrate and settle this department strike.

The CHAIRMAN. Through whom? In what way?

Mr. LONG. The company representatives and the employees' representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. They then sent for these men that had been elected?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And tried through them to make some settlement?

Mr. LONG. To effect a settlement, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they succeed?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What happened after that?

Mr. LONG. The men threw them out, they wouldn't even deal with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The men who struck would not deal with the so-called "company" representatives?

Mr. LONG. No, sir; because they had previously tried to arrange a settlement of their grievances and met with no success, and it led to a condition where there was a general strike threatened. They had imported men. I was the acknowledged president there of the trade union, and I told them these men could not work there in their places.

The CHAIRMAN. So when these men in that particular section went out on strike the company imported men called "scabs"?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And that led finally to a general strike all through the plant?

Mr. LONG. About 3 weeks later, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. About 3 weeks later?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did that strike last?

Mr. LONG. Well, after they had tried to negotiate with the men and effect a settlement and found it very unsuccessful, when I went over to threaten them it would terminate in a general walkout if they let the scabs work, then they asked what steps they could take to effect a settlement, and I said, "I will go up and lead the men back, if you will talk with us towards settling this," and they said they would, they would do everything to bring about a settlement. I led the men in a march two by two, 300 strong, right on over through the main office into the mill gate and we went back to work.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you had succeeded in settling the strike successfully, to the satisfaction of the men and the employers?

Mr. LONG. And the company; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then what happened?

Mr. LONG. Then we had a similar grievance in another department, the tinners. There was unrest throughout the whole plant. The wages were unsatisfactory, and the working conditions were unsatisfactory. We had a grievance in the cold roll department. It finally terminated in a general strike. We could not effect a settlement.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you attempt when these difficulties happened in these other departments to effect a settlement?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without success?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You could not get together with the company on any basis of agreement?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The result was a general strike followed?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was done to try and settle it?

Mr. LONG. Well, on the morning previous to the general strike, I went before the general committee of the company and forewarned them that there was danger of a general strike owing to general grievances through the whole plant. I met with the general manager, the general superintendent, and the various foremen and superintendents throughout the whole plant, and I warned them if it was not settled in 24 hours there would be a general tie-up, and they insisted then again that while they knew we had never met with any success in dealing with the company union—we called it the company union, and they called it the employees' representative plan—they insisted that we go back and deal through them. I asked them how could we deal through them when the representative from the cold-roll department had joined our organization and he was elected vice president and that he had won before without acting in the capacity of an employees' representative, and they laughed us out of the office.

The CHAIRMAN. The final break, then, came because the employers, or the representatives of the employers refused to deal with anybody except the representatives of the company union?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that resulted in a general strike because the other workmen, or the workmen who were not willing to deal through a company union, thought it would be unsatisfactory and useless?

Mr. LONG. Yes; after they made various attempts to effect a settlement there and to settle the grievances.

The CHAIRMAN. How long had that strike lasted?

Mr. LONG. That strike lasted 3 weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. And finally it came to the attention of the Labor Board?

Mr. LONG. Finally it came to the attention of the National Labor Board; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And some orders were issued that have not been complied with, and the matter is now, according to Senator Wagner, in the hands of the Attorney General?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. It resulted in an agreement being drawn up there that the strike would terminate.

The CHAIRMAN. You went back to work, I understand.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But the conditions that you wanted to improve or change have not been improved, the agreement has not been carried out?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. There was an election to be held supervised by the Labor Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The Labor Board has not held that election?

Mr. LONG. No, sir; they ignored the agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. You did have an election at which you selected the representatives?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the employers refused to recognize the men chosen under the Labor Board's election?

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. No; we ordered the election to be held and prescribed the procedure to be followed in the election, so that the election would be free from any coercion and intimidation and that each worker would have a free choice as to who he wanted to represent him, and the plan that we proposed the company refused to accept, although an agreement to that effect was made, and they insisted on conducting their own election, which was nothing but the company union plan.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. We threatened another general strike.

The CHAIRMAN. And there is a threat now of another general strike?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Because the men are insisting that they have representatives of their own and not representatives of the company union?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much.

Mr. LONG. I would like to say further, if I may, the agreement that we had reached in Senator Wagner's Board, before Senator Wagner's board, the Labor Board, stated that the strike should be called off immediately, that all men now on strike should be taken back to work without any intimidation, without any interference, discrimination, or physical examination; an election should be held the second week of December, the methods of procedure prescribed by the National Labor Board, the election should be held under the supervision of the National Labor Board, and any matters of dispute arising from this agreement shall be submitted to the National Labor Board for decision. Is that correct, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. Correct.

Mr. LONG. Upon returning to work we got along very well for about 2 days, and then they began to lay off men, supposedly reducing forces, something that never had been practiced there previous to that, they always introduced what they call the stretch-out system, to split the work up amongst those who were employed, and the result is we have today 600 men out of work.

The CHAIRMAN: Did it so happen that the men the company could best lay off were men who had been active in the movement?

Mr. LONG. Very active; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The movement for an independent organization?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course they did not consider that in laying off these men?

Mr. LONG. They trimmed it up with a pretty phrase, they were "reducing forces", and yet they were getting ready to operate 100 percent. They are operating today 100 percent.

In the election they held there on December 11, they supposedly nominated the employees' representatives, the committeemen. There was less, by actual count, Senator, than 3 percent participated in that vote. Less than 3 percent participated. They openly defied the orders of the National Labor Board, and then on December 15 they held an election.

The CHAIRMAN. Of their own?

Mr. LONG. Of their own, openly defying the agreement of the National Labor Board and the strikers and the companies. They held their election, and we have, I think, somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,000 affidavits stating the methods of procedure at that election where men had actually been driven to the polls on the end of a riot stick, where a man had gotten his arm fractured being dragged to the polls.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. LONG. By foremen of this company; where men were openly sent home and discharged, they told them that is why they were discharged, because they would not participate in the election.

The CHAIRMAN. You have affidavits of these facts?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. The foreman would come around and tell you that it does not matter how you vote, or who you vote for; if you want to you can cast a blank ballot, but go up and vote; all they wanted to do is get the men checked off as having voted. Comic characters out of the paper were elected in various departments; men who served on the board. Mae West was elected in one department, Popeye was elected in another department. That goes to show you how seriously the men took that. Nevertheless the company insisted that that plan go into effect.

Senator DAVIS. Where did you hold the meeting?

Mr. LONG. What meeting do you refer to?

Senator DAVIS. The meetings to vote.

Mr. LONG. Right in the mill, Senator. Never before in the history of the company's existence had they offered to pay us on a Sunday night, and on that Sunday night it was 2 days before the regular scheduled pay day, and they put the voting booth right up close to where the paymaster would come in to pay the men, when 2 weeks previous to that we had to go out and stand in the cold, in the rain, to get the pay, not in the paymaster's office, but we were not participating in the election then. They passed the word around they were going to put the works to us on December 15 and make it tough. They shut my end of the mill down, cut me out of the mill, because I threatened to call a strike. I protested it because we were supposed to have an election under the Government supervision.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Long, we thank you very much for giving us this practical illustration.

Mr. LONG. In the event that this Senator Wagner bill does not go through, we have 134 letters with us from one firm down in Birmingham, Ala., that pledged their support, and there is a National Steel strike in the making right now.

Senator WAGNER. We want to avoid that, of course.

Mr. LONG. The Executive order issued by President Roosevelt has been ignored and openly defied. Why should that go on?

Senator WAGNER. All you men want is the rights that you have under section 7 (a), the right to organize.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; the right to select our own representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Long, do you want the names of the other men who are with you in the record?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That you have with you here?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They would confirm what you have said?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator WAGNER. Is there a strip mill in Weirton?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. I have a representative from the strip mill here with me.

Senator WAGNER. I just wanted to ask you what the size of the billet or ingot, or whatever you call it, is that you make down there.

Mr. LONG. They have various sizes there. It runs from approximately 4 inches up to 38 inches.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the same situation you have described taking place in the plant in Michigan?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir, that is a similar case.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a representative here from Michigan?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps for reasons of protection the names of these men ought not to be put into the record. What do you think?

Mr. LONG. They are not afraid, Senator. Do you want the names?

The CHAIRMAN. May we have the names, please?

Mr. LONG. Mel Moore, Charles Greenwood, Jake Entinger, Jack Reese, William Milstead, T. I. Lewis, and Charles Anderson.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. Have you got a statement you can put in the record?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

(The statement above referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT FOR THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR, RE: COMPANY UNION OF THE WEIRTON STEEL CO.

We, the committee who appeared before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor on March 20, 1934, represent 18,000 employees of the National Steel Corporation. The Weirton Steel Co. is a subsidiary of the National Steel Corporation.

Weirton Steel Co. employees took for granted that section 7 (a) of N.R.A. guaranteed them the right to join a bona fide trade organization. The employees of said company, by popular and free choice, joined of their own free will the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, to act as their representative for collective bargaining and for their mutual aid and protection. Employees of the company have shown good faith in responding.

Meanwhile the company held an election in June for representatives under the employee-representation plan, which they introduced soon after they heard of section 7 (a). Previously the employees had had no representation of any kind. This plan, an exact duplicate of the plan at Wheeling Steel Corporation, was introduced for no other purpose than to defeat the intentions of section 7 (a). During this election the foremen came to men on the job and insisted that they go and vote, stating that it was compulsory. A ready-picked slate was presented to the men, with no opposition slate. The company counted the votes.

Knowing, however, what section 7 (a) guaranteed us, we took advantage of that. We have shown a majority of approximately 90 percent of the employees, now signed members in the Amalgamated Association. But Weirton Steel Co still insists that employees deal only through their representation plan.

Because the company ignored representatives that the employees chose freely at their own meetings, employees at Clarksburg, Weirton, and Steubenville finally struck September 26, 1933, and 95 percent of the employees came out. The only ones in the plant were maintenance men whom we permitted to go in at the company's request. In fact we had to coax our men to go in and carry on the maintenance the company requested.

The strike ended October 16 through an agreement drawn up before the National Labor Board. This agreement stated that all employees now on strike should go back to work immediately, without prejudice, discrimination or physical examination. An election shall be held the second week of December 1933. Methods and procedure for the election shall be prescribed by the National Labor Board. The election shall be held under supervision of the National Labor Board. Any dispute arising from this agreement shall be submitted to the National Labor Board for decision. The agreement was signed by E. T. Weir of the Weirton Steel Co., William J. Long of the strikers' committee, and Senator Robert F. Wagner of the Board.

As soon as employees returned to work, discrimination, intimidation, and coercion was immediately shown by the company, men being laid off daily by the score. Protests were sent at once to Senator Wagner on the National Labor Board at Pittsburgh November 20. The Board issued a summons for E. T. Weir, but he did not appear. Efforts to settle the controversy came to nothing because of E. T. Weir's refusal to appear before the Board.

Over 400 Weirton Steel employees who were active in the union have been laid off and discharged; some were told that this was because the company had to reduce forces, and others were frankly told that it was because of their union activities. Meanwhile by a careful check up we have ascertained that the company has hired about twice that number of new men.

We have affidavits of workers that E. M. Mentzer, employment agent and safety director for the Weirton Steel Co., told them, when they applied for work, that they were blacklisted and would never again work for the Weirton Steel Co. Sons and daughters and nephews of men who have been active in the A.A. have had difficulty getting jobs, since the strike. In some cases, after working a few days they would be dismissed, with no explanation. Such cases occurred not only in Weirton but in other towns up and down the valley. Men seeking work in other towns are not hired if they admit they came from Weirton. A sister of an active unionist (she had worked for the company 10 years) was discharged from the office.

Although the company had agreed to let the National Labor Board supervise the election in December, the company refused to abide by this agreement and conducted its own primary and final election. In the primary election, held December 11, less than 3 percent of the employees voted at all. The company, realizing that employees would not freely accept their plan, used more drastic methods in the final election held December 15.

They had State police patrolling the town of Weirton, which is company owned and unincorporated, and their own mill police force had riot sticks and cooperated with foremen in forcing men to poll. They used extra men to relieve regular workers to vote, and foremen stated that if we did not vote they would discharge us and give the job to the extra men. In one case in the sheet mill department, Benny Jones, a foreman, in trying to force a man to the polls, knocked him over a pile of iron, so injuring his wrist that he had to go to the hospital. Although the company shut down some departments that day so that leading unionists might not be present, they sent around to the homes of others on the crews demanding that they come down to the mill and vote; that if they did not they need not report to work any more. Pay day was moved up 2 days to coincide with this election day. And the ballot boxes were placed next to the pay windows and men were required to vote before they drew their pay.

Nevertheless some men refused to vote, and many of them have since been discharged. Their families have been told that mortgages would be foreclosed on their homes, and some have had their furniture sold. Local banks refuse to buy the bonds for home owners loans for these people.

Even now, when we hold union meetings, managers, supers, and foremen stand across the street watching to see who goes in, usually one boss from each department. When Mrs. Pinchot, wife of the Governor of Pennsylvania, spoke to a union meeting, there were 30 bosses across the street from the manager down, and Mrs. Pinchot has already reported this.

Now these union men who are discharged, and their hungry children, are really victims of section 7 (a), because they joined the union in the confidence that section 7 (a) guaranteed them that right. Almost 6 months ago they tried to organize for collective bargaining. Governmental agencies have ruled that Weir is in the wrong, but they have so far failed to coerce him in the slightest. He is still pouring funds into the company union, paying the salaries of officers, and taking revenge on those who prefer some other union. The Department of Justice has said it may seek an injunction to restrain Weirton Steel from interfering with an outside election held by the Labor Board. But this procedure may take 6 months or a year. And then the fight will start all over again to try to get Mr. Weir to recognize and contract with the union the men chose in that election.

We demand that Congress cut through all this red tape and make it illegal for an employer to finance a union. Let the workers have a union they are willing to pay for themselves, not a company union run by the other party. There can be no collective bargaining and no enforcement of section 7 (a) as long as one party to the bargain can dominate both sides.

Submitted on behalf of the Weirton, Clarksburg, Steubenville, and Ecorse lodges of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers.

The CHAIRMAN. You reside where?

Mr. RAUSHENBUSH. Harrisburg, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have your views in regard to this bill.

Mr. RAUSHENBUSH. The first thing I would like to do would be to introduce for your consideration the statement made by President John A. Phillips of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor in support of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. You may submit it for the record.

(The statement above referred to is as follows:)

HARRISBURG, PA., March 19, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: The Wagner bill is supported by laboring men and women throughout Pennsylvania because they have had a long and bitter experience with the privately paid and privately owned company unions. The operation of these unions has helped make Pennsylvania the low-wage State of the North. It has helped keep purchasing power in Pennsylvania low, and has made it a drag on the recovery of the rest of the Nation. These unions, originated, financed, and managed by the company officials, who have the unquestioned power of firing men, have scared every man and woman who values his job to death. They dare not attend open meetings. They dare not raise the question of a real union or a real vote. Such exercise of the rights of freedom means discharge. It takes only a few discharges to intimidate a whole community.

This bill will stop company unions if it is enforced. For that reason we are for the bill to the limit. It makes possible real democracy in choosing representatives instead of making every worker into a candidate for the bread lines. At present the slightest opposition to his employer's private organization means economic suicide for practically every worker in Pennsylvania.

Our long experience with these employe representation organizations has brought us to the conclusion that they are nothing but a fraud on the word "representation." They are part and parcel of the drive toward fascism in America. One of the most important features of fascism is control by the industries and the Government of the workers, and the abolition of free unions. These company unions fit neatly into that picture. Where they have been established for a long time, as in the steel industry and the captive mines of that industry, there has been a practice of using State police and company police commissioned as deputy sheriffs to shoot down men who are trying to get such rights as were given to them in section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act. This was done in Pennsylvania all last summer. To shoot down the opposition to company unions is a natural part of the fascist development established by such organizations.

In behalf of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor we ask you to stop this development from going any further and to do it by passing this bill.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN A. PHILLIPS, President.

Mr. RAUSHENBUSH. The interest of Pennsylvania in this bill is partly due to the fact that it is a low-wage state and has, through the whole depression, been among the two or three lowest wage paying states in the whole north and west. We see a close connection between this fact and company unions, for Pennsylvania is a state in which these unions are very prevalent.

During my two years as director of industrial relations for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, reports on approximately 900 disputes were handled by the State Bureau of Industrial Relations which was working in cooperation with the United States Bureau of Mediation. The element of company unions and the fear generated by it entered into a great number of these disputes. This was especially true during the whole coal strike of the summer of 1933, which devolved out of the company town and company union system. It is only with an understanding of this company union system and the fear that it generates in workers, that people can appreciate the indignation of the workers against the decision by General Johnson in regard to the Budd case. The decision, made just the other day, was to the effect that the police should be assigned at a certain union election. To the laymen this meant nothing at all. To the workers, trained in the fear of discharge, the matter of signing their names to a ballot against the company, meant economic suicide, and all of them understood it in that way, that is the loss of their jobs as soon as the management found out how they had voted. The result was an indignation meeting against the conduct of the election, and a wave of resentment through the state. Only those who had known the inside workings of companies who are trying their best to keep out regular unions, and who have, in many cases, spent millions of dollars over a period of years in this activity, could appreciate the fact that a discharge or a failure to get promotion followed almost automatically any attempt to secure free expression.

During the coal strike of 1933, in the course of which I was in the field a great deal and talked with both the company union men and the others, as well as the deputy sheriffs, the picture became fairly clear that this was one of the companies which had invested some millions of dollars in keeping unions out, and that involved a very interesting development. It involved protecting the people, the members of the company union who had been "loyal" to the company for a long time, at the expense of the noncompany union men, that apparently involved some special privileges in the mines for themselves, some freedom from fear of discharge on their part, some preference, perhaps, in housing. It produced a group solidarity among the favored and hand-picked employees, which had important results.

The provision in most of the company union plans, including the Frick plan, that citizens should be American has a significance that is often neglected. In this particular case "American" meant that no foreigners could possibly get in, and many of the workers who had been brought into that district by the coal companies originally were of alien origin. The raising of this particular qualification as a barrier produced a situation in the course of which several fiery crosses were burned. In other words, the religious issue was raised, and that seemed at the time to be a natural concomitant of the whole company union plan.

President Phillips, in his statement, has pointed out that these company unions fit into a Fascist development. He says that one of the most important features of Fascism is control by the industries and the government of the workers and the abolition of free unions. These company unions fit neatly into that picture. He makes the point, which I think is important, that where these company unions have been established for a long time there has been a practice of using State police and company police commissioned as deputy sheriffs to shoot down men who are trying to get such rights as were given to them in section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act. In other words, government police, in this case privately paid by the companies, but commissioned by the various county governments, were carrying out the will of the men who are trying to keep out real unions.

You will hear later in the testimony of Mr. Abelman of two incidents in February, and one incident in March, in Nazareth, Bangor, and Reading of company union meetings policed by the companies, in the course of which the union men were thrown out by policemen and prevented from any participation in the meetings of the company unions.

The main point I wish to make in this connection is that where you have an uncontrolled power to dismiss, which has been used over a period of years, very definitely, people are so scared that they will not buck a company union unless they have some guaranty that their rights to free speech and free election are protected.

There has been nothing so far in the enforcement of the N.R.A., particularly in the compliance angle, which has given people faith in the protection the N.R.A. gives anybody. I have been informed from various sources that a good number of people who make complaints about compliance in regard to hours and wages have been dismissed. Of course, a few dismissals intimidate a whole community.

The need for this bill is increased because of the failure of the N.R.A. compliance to date. The situation, as far as the confidence of people in securing protection is concerned, is far worse now than it was in the early days of the N.R.A. and if there is to be an end to the restrictive power of employers to intimidate workers in company unions, it must be accompanied by a very considerable measure of enforcement power on the part of the National Labor Board in regard to the various practices mentioned.

I wish particularly to second the statement in general made by Dr. Leiserson and the amendments suggested by Professor Witte this morning. The differentiation between employee-representation plans and real unions is very important and should be incorporated in the bill in the two places suggested.

In the main, the whole problem of this act depends upon the strength and intent of enforcement, and certainly some system may be devised whereby quicker action can be secured than has been secured so far. In this connection I wish to make emphatic dissent to the proposal by Mr. Beyer that strikes should be held in status quo for 30 days or 60 days. That is exactly what was attempted in the Weir case and Budd case, with the result that the workers felt that the Government had deserted them and left them during that period of time at the mercy of the employers. In both cases there seems to have been discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand adjourned to tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at the hour of 1 p.m. the committee adjourned until 10 a.m. of the following day, Wednesday, Mar. 21, 1934.)

TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1934

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10:05 a.m., in room 335, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C., Senator David I. Walsh (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Black, Thomas, and Davis.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Is Mr. Karlin here?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes; Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to appear before the committee?

Mr. KARLIN. I appear for several labor organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you desire to be heard by the committee?

Mr. KARLIN. I do; yes, sir.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM KARLIN, LEGAL ADVISER FOR VARIOUS LABOR ORGANIZATIONS AFFILIATED WITH THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give us your full name, please?

Mr. KARLIN. William Karlin.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. KARLIN. 230 West Seventy-sixth Street, New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. What official positions, if any, do you hold in labor organizations?

Mr. KARLIN. I am the legal adviser for the International Jewelry Workers Union.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been associated with that organization?

Mr. KARLIN. About 18 years. I am also the legal adviser for several locals of the Building Service Employees International Union. I am also the legal adviser for several locals of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butchers Workers Union. I am also the legal adviser for at least a half dozen other labor organizations, large and small, and have, during the past 20 years or more, been in an advisory capacity to a large number of labor organizations in their industrial problems, their strike problems, and their legal problems. I have appeared in equity proceedings involving industrial and labor disputes for 20 years, and some of those were litigations of importance.

The CHAIRMAN. For whom do you appear this morning, other than yourself?

Mr. KARLIN. For the International Jewelry Workers Union.

The CHAIRMAN. How large a membership has that union?

Mr. KARLIN. About, to be certain of, 20,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KARLIN. The Amalgamated Meat Cutters, locals 174 and 211; the Window Cleaners Protective Union, local no. 2, of the Building Service Employees International Union; the Doll and Toy Workers Union; in all organizations the membership comprises several scores of thousands.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you proceed to present your views concerning the pending bill?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes. I think the committee will agree with me that there is no need of going into generalities as to the necessity for collective bargaining in our modern age. I just want to show you a few instances of what attempts some of my labor organizations have made for collective bargaining, and what results they have had.

I have in mind at this time the Waterbury Clock Co. which made a serious attempt to compel its workers to join a company union in preference to their own bona fide trade union which they had chosen.

The CHAIRMAN. When was this?

Mr. KARLIN. This was about 7 months ago.

The CHAIRMAN. So that these illustrations that you are going to give us are circumstances and acts that have happened since the passage of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. KARLIN. I will attempt to give you only those. If any others come to my mind, it will be a very slight deviation.

These people who were employed by the Waterbury Clock Co., No. 254, many hundreds of them had joined what is known as Local No. 90 and Local No. 40 of the International Jewelry Workers Union, and which covered two towns, New Haven and Waterbury. At the time that the Waterbury workers began to join the International Jewelry Workers Union, the company began to organize a union of its own and invited its employees to join. They issued particular literature, authorized and published by the company, and attempted to show the workers that it was for their interest to join the company union, rather than the bona fide trade union. The workers, however, did not heed the propaganda of the Waterbury Clock Co., and preferred to join an independent labor union of their own. Then the company initiated what they called a ballot by the workers, to designate their intention to join the company union. Out of the 2,500 workers, less than 500 had designated their intention to join the company union, but out of the 500 or so designated ostensibly, in reality there was an insignificant number of the industrial workers who did so. The white-collar persons employed by the company were requested to participate in that vote, and they did, and some of those white-collar people deposited as many as 12 ballots. This was officially stated heretofore at hearings conducted in preparation for a code covering the clock industry by workers who are actually employed by the Waterbury Clock Co., in the presence of officers of that company, and not one of those officers present denied the practice of stuffing the ballot boxes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now was there any trade union in existence at this Waterbury plant previous to this?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes, there was.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it in full operation?

Mr. KARLIN. No, it was a dormant organization.

The CHAIRMAN. So that while this organization was dormant, the company itself sought to establish a company union?

Mr. KARLIN. No, it was when this labor union revived and attracted many hundred of persons, over a thousand of them, that the company made a serious attempt to organize this company union. The workers, however, resisted to such an extent that the company was never able to gather even 20 percent of its industrial workers, and so they decided to close up the shop. All the plants of the Waterbury Co. were closed up and the workers were sent home. The workers were quitely told by the superintendents and foremen of the plant what the object of closing the plant was. But the open and ostensible reason for closing it was that the company needed financing, and that they would reopen when the question of financing was taken care of.

The CHAIRMAN. How long was the plant closed?

Mr. KARLIN. For several weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it now open?

Mr. KARLIN. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any organization of the workers recognized?

Mr. KARLIN. No. All those workers who are officers or otherwise active in the organization, including scores of them, and particularly the dozen or so who were outstandingly active, were never taken back when the plant reopened. When the plant reopened, every worker who was at his job was compelled to sign a card, and on that card there was an indication of an intention to join the company union, and if they did not designate such an intention they were not called back. Among those who were not called back are scores of workers who had been somewhat active in the local union of the International Jewelry Workers Union.

The CHAIRMAN. Now that closes the incident at Waterbury that you wanted to bring to the attention of the committee, doesn't it?

Mr. KARLIN. I will go back to that in a few minutes with an authoritative statement by an International officer of this International Union.

Now I will refer to the case of the 11 slaughterhouses.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they located?

Mr. KARLIN. In the metropolitan district of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they managed by 11 different owners, or are they under the control of one owner?

Mr. KARLIN. They are owned by 11 different owners ostensibly, but really controlled by the four largest packers in the United States, including Wilson & Co., Cudahy & Co., Swift & Co., and Armour & Co. They do business under various names, but their financial structures are imbedded in the large companies, and those large companies have all the policies made for all slaughterhouses and all packing houses throughout the country in Chicago. If you go to one of these local houses to make a proposition involving collective bargaining or otherwise, they frankly tell you they have to communicate with the home office, which invariably is Chicago, and after Chicago decides, they know what to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Now when did the incident you are going to testify to take place?

Mr. KARLIN. February 26 up to the present date.

The CHAIRMAN. Prior to February 26, was there any trade union in these 11 slaughterhouses?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes, sir; an active trade union.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of trade union?

Mr. KARLIN. The Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen's Union of North America, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and the locals in each of these slaughter houses.

The CHAIRMAN. How many men are employed in these plants?

Mr. KARLIN. About 3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. They are about evenly divided between the 11?

Mr. KARLIN. No, some of these are smaller plants and others are larger.

The CHAIRMAN. And all of these employees belong to one central union or to different unions?

Mr. KARLIN. No, they belong to the different local union in the metropolitan district.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that union active in February last?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes, it had been active for months prior to that time.

The CHAIRMAN. While that union was active for months prior to that time, what happened?

Mr. KARLIN. The International Union sent out agreement forms to all the local unions to present to their respective employers. Among these local unions that got these forms of agreements were the unions in the metropolitan district, and they sent contracts, or proposed contracts, to these 11 slaughter houses. The contracts were all uniform as to the labor conditions, wages, working hours, and standards of operation. The companies paid no attention whatsoever to these communications which had been sent them weeks before. On or about February 26, I do not recall the exact date, the matter had been called by me to the attention of the Regional Labor Board at 45 Broadway, New York City, that these employers had shown no recognition whatsoever, even by way of the courtesy of a reply to any of these communications from the union of the proposed agreements.

As fortune would have it, the day that our news broke, the Government of the United States had apprehended these large companies fixing prices in the dark of the moon, and it was published, broadcast all over the country, and that gave us the opportunity for a little spotlight at the time, and every one of these companies came to 45 Broadway. Ordinarily they would not show up, and I am telling you that from previous experience with similar companies also affiliated with these packing houses. As a rule they do not show up. They may or may not send down an attorney. But on this occasion, all of the 11 slaughterhouses were represented, and because of the extraordinary publicity that had been given in the papers, this story of ours also got some publicity.

Each one of these representatives of the 11 slaughterhouses said they were ready to meet us. We said, "We are ready to go on right now and do some bargaining." They said, "No, not now; you have to come to our places of business." And so John J. Walsh, the vice president of the International Union, with which these locals are affiliated, visited each one of these slaughterhouses.

The CHAIRMAN. Had these slaughterhouses entered into a code agreement prior to this time?

Mr. KARLIN. They had what they call a temporary agreement in lieu of an N.R.A. Code.

Senator DAVIS. Are the slaughterhouses locally owned?

Mr. KARLIN. No; owned and controlled by the packers in Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness testified they are owned by the Chicago packers.

Mr. KARLIN. They said we will have to come to their places of business, and when John J. Walsh went to each one of them he was told there must have been a misunderstanding. The phrase was almost the same in Swift & Co., Armour & Co., and all the others. It was just around that time that we called them to the N.R.A., and before the scandalous publicity that they got, and each one of them sent us a stereotyped reply. That reply, strange to say, had the same phraseology, not only the same argument, but in some cases it had the same phraseology, as to how much welfare work they were doing for their employees, and how well they were taking care of them, and that there was no need of dealing with any other organization when they could just as well deal with their own organization, and that these men are getting all that the company can possibly give them.

And now you remember before we sent our complaint to the N.R.A. they never answered us, and now they gave us that stereotyped reply. It stands to reason that that reply was concocted in the same office, and the form letter was sent to each one of the companies. Now, imagine hundreds and hundreds of places all over the United States sending to the International Office of the Butcher Workers Union the same stereotyped reply.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose there isn't any doubt but that they were in agreement with each other, having signed a code and having entered into agreements, they naturally would proceed in unison.

Mr. KARLIN. I appreciate that the Chair gives them the extraordinary benefit of the doubt. My own version of it is not nearly as charitable as that of the Chair. I haven't any doubt at all that for the purpose of making prices, for the purpose of marketing, and for the purpose of everything else, except dealing with labor, these companies are deliberately well organized.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I do not want to appear to be making a defense for them, but as I understand it, your testimony is that the men who are working as employees of these different slaughterhouses, are cooperating with the same union, and are working in unison.

Mr. KARLIN. That is exactly what I say, but they are denying us collective bargaining, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we should not over emphasize the fact that they act jointly in resisting you, improperly, perhaps. The point is that they may be denying their employees what they are doing.

Mr. KARLIN. With all due respect to the Chair, I have only one purpose in emphasizing, that is that they are dealing collectively and we are entitled to collective dealing with them, and if they do not do it while they are flying the Blue Eagle, there is only one way to compel them to do it, and that is by means of this bill that Senator Wagner is now attempting to have made into law.

The CHAIRMAN. My comment is they are acting collectively and they have a right under the code to do it. The inference is that the employees have a right to do the same thing. What happened next?

Mr. KARLIN. Mr. Walsh went to these places and they would not bargain with him at all. They told him there was a misunderstanding. Mr. Walsh left himself an opening for coming back there again, and he came back there on another occasion, to each one of these places. So within 2 weeks he canvassed them twice until he was complete, certain of the fact that they did not intend to deal with these unions collectively, that they did not intend to recognize these organizations and that they had organizations of their own with which they preferred to deal.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, did they have organizations of their own?

Mr. KARLIN. The companies have organizations of their own.

The CHAIRMAN. You haven't said anything about that yet.

Mr. KARLIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. When did they start these organizations of their own?

Mr. KARLIN. The company unions, the so-called "welfare organizations" were more or less dormant until the advent of the N.R.A., and with the advent of the N.R.A. and the threat of labor unionism to spread into their plants, they revived these organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. And the real picture is that there were trade-union organizations that had been established for some time, seeking to deal with these owners?

Mr. KARLIN. And never succeeded.

The CHAIRMAN. And they had this same company organization that they preferred to deal with?

Mr. KARLIN. That is right. Now, in fairness to these companies, however, it must be stated that there are certain sections in the United States where labor-union sentiment is strong. For instance, in the provision-manufacturing establishments where there is a public demand for union-made goods, these companies gave us recognition, and some of the companies gave us recognition in the provision departments in New York City, among them, the largest packers of provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. What has been the outcome of this controversy?

Mr. KARLIN. There has been no outcome.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, this contention on the part of the employers that they prefer to deal with their own company organizations, rather than the trade-union organizations, has continued up to the present time?

Mr. KARLIN. It is continuous.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any strike?

Mr. KARLIN. No; there has been no strike.

The CHAIRMAN. But the point you want to make is that friction is continuing up to date.

Mr. KARLIN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The employers are unwilling to recognize the trade-union employees.

Mr. KARLIN. Yes; and there are impending strikes because of that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. There are threatened strikes, you mean, because of that fact?

Mr. KARLIN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we understand the situation. Now, will you go to the next case?

Mr. KARLIN. Now, we come to the case of the Newark jewelry manufacturers.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they located?

Mr. KARLIN. They are all located in Newark, N.J.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they a series of different plants?

Mr. KARLIN. They have between 39 and 50 plants.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they small plants, all of them?

Mr. KARLIN. Some of them are larger plants, employing as many as 60. One plant employs 90. Most of the plants employ between 10 and 20 persons.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they located?

Mr. KARLIN. In Newark, N.J.

The CHAIRMAN. So that all over the city of Newark, N.J., there are this large number of small jewelry plants located, and there are a number of employees operating or working in these plants who have sought to organize?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they organized before the N.R.A.?

Mr. KARLIN. It was a dormant organization.

The CHAIRMAN. After the N.R.A. they began to revive the organization?

Mr. KARLIN. Until they numbered all the workers who were working in the plants, with the exception of 39.

The CHAIRMAN. In all these various plants?

Mr. KARLIN. In all these various plants.

The CHAIRMAN. Now how has the company treated this labor organization? Is that organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes; it is known as "Local No. 2" of the International Jewelry Workers Union, which, in turn, is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members has it?

Mr. KARLIN. The paper membership is as high as 1,800, but since there are only 600 people employed, for the sake of this discussion we must count the membership of 600, to be truthful, because the paper membership in a lot of organizations could not be the measure of strength.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the working hours and wages of these various jewelry plants the same?

Mr. KARLIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. How could they be other than the same under the N.R.A.?

Mr. KARLIN. Because the N.R.A. has no salary classifications. That is one of the things I have been fighting for, in 16 different codes in Washington. The salary classifications have been omitted by some mysterious process that I cannot state here.

The CHAIRMAN. Isn't there a minimum wage in all the codes?

Mr. KARLIN. There is a minimum wage for people whom we do not consider jewelers of 40 cents an hour. Forty cents an hour is not considered a wage for the jeweler. They fixed wages for everybody, that is, the women workers, the unskilled workers and sectional press hands, and such, but they did not fix any wages for jewelers.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you state that these codes that have been made under the direction of the National Recovery Administration fix wages for large classes of employees, among them you have named several, but have not fixed a wage for the regular jewelry employees.

Mr. KARLIN. The answer is in the affirmative, with this statement, however, Mr. Chairman, that the overwhelming majority of the workers in the jewelry trade are skilled hands, and their wages were not fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. I understood there was a minimum wage stipulation in every code.

Mr. KARLIN. There is a minimum wage of 40 cents an hour fixed. Our people do not work for 40 cents an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in these codes.

Mr. KARLIN. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. So you have a situation in this group of small jewelry concerns in the city of Newark where the wages are not uniform.

Mr. KARLIN. Correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And each owner bargains with his own group, fixing the wages and laboring conditions as he sees fit.

Mr. KARLIN. Hitherto.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, on the other hand, there are the employees who are all organized in one union, the employees from these various shops, and they are seeking to get uniform wages and uniform working conditions?

Mr. KARLIN. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. What success have they had with that?

Mr. KARLIN. In order to give you the picture of it, I want to start with what happened in New York a few days previously. On October 23, 1933, we entered into an agreement with over 300 employers in New York City, in which wages were fixed for piece workers and time workers, so that a skilled diamond setter would receive not less than $1.25 an hour working on platinum work, and as high as $1.50 an hour working on the better kind of diamond setting; that skilled jewelers would get not less than $1 an hour, and platinum jewelers would get not less than $1.25 an hour, and the so-called "Class B" mechanic would get not less than 70 cents an hour. If you recall, Mr. Chairman, that the code provides for 40 cents an hour, you will see how little relation the code has to this situation of salaries in our trade.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the minimum named in the code.

Mr. KARLIN. Yes. This involved all the workers that were actually employed in New York, and they have 3,300 jewelers, about 1,200 were employed. When we got this contract in New York, the Newark workers got the fever and they also wanted a similar contract, and prevailed upon their international union, for which I am speaking here today, to present a similar contract to the Newark employers. When it was presented, the employers did not reply.

The CHAIRMAN. You say a contract was made with the jewelers in New York?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the percentage of difference in the wages paid in Newark and those agreed to in the contract in New York, approximately?

Mr. KARLIN. The most highly skilled jewelers in Newark were making far below subsistence wages. My own personal acquaintance with some of these highly skilled mechanics in Newark is that they were earning $15 a week, men who were making pieces of jewelry that sold for hundred and hundreds of dollars each piece, were making less than $15 a week, most of the time, and very seldom as much as $20 a week. Occasionally a man would put in a full week and would earn a little more than $20. The condition of the Newark workers was far below the subsistence wage, taking them by and large, and the employers had that advantage over them, for the reason that out of 1,800 jewelers in Newark, a little less than 600 were employed. That enabled the employers to unscrupulously reduce the wages to far below the subsistence level.

When we presented our agreement, as I said a minute ago, Senator, we got no reply. Then we called upon the regional labor board in New York City, to ask them to come in, and some of them did come in, 18 or 20 responded the first time. When they came down they said that they were not organized and they only came down to listen. They listened for a while and went home without saying what they intended to do, but with the ostensible understanding that they were going back to organize, and when they organized they would come back and give the regional labor board a reply. They did not come back again until they were called for again, and when they came back the second time, there was a much larger group of employers, but they said they did not know whether we were representing the union.

The CHAIRMAN. May I divert you again? Will you answer my question as to what the difference is between the wages paid to men and women working in the jewelry shops in Newark, compared with those doing the same kind of work in New York?

Mr. KARLIN. I have already told Senator Davis, for the record. If you want me to repeat it, I will tell you.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish, having been called out for a few minutes, you would briefly tell me. Is it 10 percent, 15 percent, 25 percent, or what?

Mr. KARLIN. You cannot state it in percentages, except it is far below the subsistence level.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is important——

Mr. KARLIN. It is far below.

The CHAIRMAN. Wait a minute. It is important, because a company recognizing collective bargaining will be driven out of business, if it must compete with a company that will not recognize collective bargaining, if one agrees to pay higher wages than the other. Isn't that true?

Mr. KARLIN. There is a great deal of truth to what you say, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any doubt about it? If five employers recognize collective bargaining and pay higher wages, and another five have an open shop and recognize no collective bargaining, and pay the men lower wages, will they not have an advantage?

Mr. KARLIN. I will have to qualify the answer, because there is a reasonable doubt in my mind about it. I would be unfair to you if I told you you are perfectly correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I have been trying to make an argument for collective bargaining, in the interest of the employer, but I have not succeeded very well.

Mr. KARLIN. Here is the fact: The unorganized frequently benefit from the efforts of the organized, and since the organized in a community establish a higher scale of wages, the employers in the open shops who want to avoid dealing with the union altogether frequently come up to the standards of wages that were established in the organized shops. So, if I were to tell you that invariably it works out that way, that the closed shops would have to go out of business, it would not be so, because in practice it does not work out that way. There are closed shops and open shops in the United States in the same industry, and they have existed for some time for the reason that this economic rule applies. I know it to be a fact that the open shops come up to the margin in order to keep their employees when there is a scarcity of labor, or otherwise, to keep them from organizing.

Senator DAVIS. That only applies where there is a scarcity of labor?

Mr. KARLIN. It does not only apply there, no. Where the firm wants to prevent the employees from organizing, very often the firm has a militant influence in their shop, and to prevent them from organizing they will come up to the scale of wages and give them the same thing, or pretty nearly the same thing that they will get in the closed shop.

The CHAIRMAN. Sometimes better?

Mr. KARLIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the difficulty is that that does not last. That exists when there is danger of the employees getting together to organize a union independent of the employers.

Mr. KARLIN. Yes. Now the other point of your statement was perfectly correct. Inconsistent as it may appear, in view of what I have said, it still stands up, because in the long run the employer who pays higher wages will either go out of business, or cut wages. That is why the union is constantly active in trying to equalize the wage scale. If it were not for this union activity, the employer in the open shop would never raise wages. It is the union activity that compels him to raise wages.

The CHAIRMAN. Now what is the situation today in Newark?

Mr. KARLIN. While you were out, Mr. Chairman, I told Senator Davis that the first time the employers came to the regional labor board in response to our request and complaint, that they did not answer, there were a comparatively small group, about 18 or 20, and they said they wanted to go back and form their own lines first before they could give any response. When they came the second time they had a much larger group, but they said they did not know that we represented their men, they wanted to be shown. I might just as well tell you what happened at that time. I took out my watch and I looked at it and I said, "Now, it is 20 minutes to 1. If we can get the people out of the shops by 1 o'clock, will that be proof that we represent them?" Knowing very well that we did represent the men, they did not accept that challenge, but they walked out without giving us any recognition or willingness to bargain collectively.

The regional labor board was constantly, for weeks, endeavoring to convince the employers that they ought to make some test to find out whether we represented them or not. One of them was to conduct a vote. The employers refused that, until finally the union had to call a strike. For 12 weeks that strike was raging, but the employers would give no recognition. Finally the regional labor board prevailed upon the National Labor Board to take the matter up. The National Labor Board did take the matter up. They called in the employers, and then, for the first time, they entered into an agreement to test, by a vote, mind you, whether we represented those men or not.

Now yesterday a very eminent authority on these questions said that such a vote is silly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is what?

Mr. KARLIN. Silly, he said. You will recall yesterday's record so shows.

Now I told the National Labor Board that it would be academic—I used a very much more careful term—but the vote took place just the same, and the vote showed, by an overwhelming majority, that the union represented the men in the Newark district. Since then they were supposed to get together and bargain collectively.

We wanted to bargain here in Washington, to sit down with the employers and bargain it out, but they saw the wisdom of going into each shop separately. They chose that method. We have been going to the shops, and shop after shop, where the union representative case, and mind you, the international officers came, they were told that they would not deal with them, and seven employers out of the many involved said they would only deal with the union if all the others would deal with them first. You see, they would not deal with us in Washington when the whole group was involved. They would not deal with us in a majority of the cases, and seven employers said they would only deal with us if the others would deal with us also.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, may I ask you in order to save our time to prepare in writing similar illustrations of the difficulties that employees have had with employers in arranging for collective bagaining for the record?

Mr. KARLIN. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, of one or two more illustrations.

The CHAIRMAN. I have given you 40 minutes, and there are several other witnesses here.

Mr. KARLIN. Will you give me about 3 or 4 minutes, possibly 5?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. You may make any illustrations now that you desire. I do not want to prevent you from putting into the record all that you desire.

Mr. KARLIN. The Optical Workers is one of the cases I expect to put into the record in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be very helpful to have it. You may put in any others that you have in mind.

Mr. KARLIN. What I have in mind, above all things, is to impress upon this committee the importance of passing legislation that will make collective bargaining practical, and that will make it work. We cannot have individual bargaining any more where thousands and thousands, and in some cases scores of thousands, are working for the same employer, and even where you have 50 working for the same employer, or 15, or 10, because there are industries in which the capital investment is small, and a living is easily made by an employer employing from two to three or four men. I could give you several illustrations of such industries. It is important that this bill cover all the industries.

The CHAIRMAN. Your argument about the situation in Newark would seem to indicate the importance of including employers who have a small number of employees.

Mr. KARLIN. Precisely. You are perfectly right, Mr. Chairman. I heard one of the men say yesterday that it should be 10. Why, I could show you hundreds of employers in several industries, to my knowledge, who employ from two to three people and who make a living out of it. If they did not have to bargain with them collectively, they would have a terrific advantage over employers who employ a slightly larger number, and who would be held to collective bargaining.

I, too, was once a lawmaker, and I know how easy it is to debase a measure. I helped to make quite a number of our codes, and I know there have been changes and exceptions, and those changes and exceptions have debased most of the codes, to my knowledge.

Now I want to get in the record something that appeared in the current number of the Wall Street Journal, which is of importance, with respect to measures of this kind. I will not quote the whole thing, I will quote just a part of it. The editor says: "Do not worry so much about the President's appeal to cut hours still more without cutting pay-roll totals. So many exceptions will be granted that the rule will become the exception."

Now, as far as these company unions are concerned, I know that they are under the thumbs of the employers, in a great majority of cases, and there is no doubt but that these company unions will control wages, hours, and conditions. They are ostensibly formed as welfare organizations, but they are really formed with a view to telling the workers, "See, here, we will give you something, and you do not need a trade union. You just rely upon the cooperative spirit that your organization in this plant will have with the organization. We will get along much better that way." But the real purpose of that is to prevent a genuine trade union.

Now I say it is up to Congress to challenge and destroy this new feudalism in American industry. There are hundreds and hundreds of communities in the United States where the plant owner decides who is going to rule the town, where the plant owner decides which workingman is going to work and which is not going to work. There are hundreds and hundreds of communities in the United States where trade unionism hasn't got a chance, if the workers join the trade unions and they are discharged. This is a practical situation, in spite of the fact that the N.R.A. had carried the company by surprise and gave the workers an outlook, it gave them a hope for independence, and they were just disillusioned.

I ask you to take into consideration that if the N.R.A. is to be carried out, it has to be policed. If it has to be policed, it cannot be policed by company unions, it has to be policed by workingmen's unions of their own kind, thoroughly bona fide, without any question at all.

Now, with the advent of the N.R.A. we were looking forward to a reestablishment of the standards of living that could be compared to 1926–29. But there is no such hope. I would be misinforming you if I told you that my connections with these many, many thousands of people with whom I have come in contact, in their actual problems, that they felt they have been improved. They feel they have not been improved. They have been discharged. They come to my office and they want to be reinstated.

We make a complaint and they are not reinstated, because under the law they cannot be reinstated, because the law has been misinterpreted to mean that if an employer makes an agreement with a union to the effect that only members of the union would be employed, that it would be contrary to the N.R.A. I say nothing is further from the truth. But lawyers of prominence have made such a misinterpretation. The law has to be made categorical, so there will be no question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you, Mr. Karlin. Your practical contact with this question has been helpful to us.

Mr. KARLIN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. And your official position or positions, if any?

Mr. GORMAN. Vice president of the United Textile Workers of America.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the organization of which Mr. McMahon is the president?

Mr. GORMAN. That is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members in the organization, approximately?

Mr. GORMAN. Approximately 200,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that include the textile workers in the Southern States as well as the Northern States?

Mr. GORMAN. In all parts of the country, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the textile workers in the Southern States; North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia, as fully organized as in New England?

Mr. GORMAN. No, they are not, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. What percentage of the textile workers in the Southern States are organized, approximately?

Mr. GORMAN. At this time, of course, there is a wave going through now——

The CHAIRMAN. Let us say prior to the N.R.A. It was very small, wasn't it?

Mr. GORMAN. Very small.

The CHAIRMAN. In percentage?

Mr. GORMAN. Insignificant.

The CHAIRMAN. Insignificant?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What percentage of the textile workers in New England and New York State were organized at that time?

Mr. GORMAN. I would say about 20 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Whatever organizations there were of the textile industry were in that part of the country?

Mr. GORMAN. Practically in that part, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. In some localities textile organizations are numerous and in other localities there are scarcely any organizations?

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. For instance, in Fall River you are pretty well organized, aren't you?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And in New Bedford?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In Lawrence not so much so.

Mr. GORMAN. Not as great as in those other centers that you mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. And in the communities where the textile plants are not concentrated, you have not been able to organize?

Mr. GORMAN. We have; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where there are individual textile plants?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Like Fitchburg and Maynard?

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean prior to the N.R.A.

Mr. GORMAN. In some cases.

The CHAIRMAN. I am surprised that the number of textile organizations was at about 20 percent of the number of employees prior to the N.R.A. I thought it was larger.

Mr. GORMAN. Well, that is a rough estimate, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say 20 percent, do you mean 20 percent in the northern area, or 20 percent of the entire country?

Mr. GORMAN. Generally, throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, that would mean that in the northern area the organization percentage would be 50 or 60.

Mr. GORMAN. It would be greater, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you for answering my questions. You are interested in this bill, I assume?

Mr. GORMAN. I am, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have your views.

Mr. GORMAN. We feel that the passage of this bill will give us the needed relief.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you give us the total number of textile workers who are organized?

Mr. GORMAN. At this time I would place the approximate number at 200,000 active members. We have additional members that we term "inactive", by reason of unemployment and other reasons.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been an increase in the number of new unions since the N.R.A.?

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of an increase?

Mr. GORMAN. We have, I would say, approximately 65 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Increase?

Mr. GORMAN. Increase.

The CHAIRMAN. In new unions?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In new local unions? I think that is the term you use.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Would that same percentage hold true throughout the numerical increase of membership.

Mr. GORMAN. Just about.

The CHAIRMAN. Sixty-five percent increase?

Mr. GORMAN. Just about. We have now about 500 organizations in various parts of the country, 500 so-called local unions, some small and some large.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. GORMAN. We are, sir. We have been since 1901.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you making progress toward organizing in the Southern States?

Mr. GORMAN. We are making progress, but we are impeded by the attack of the employers against us, in the discrimination against those who join the union.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to discuss that subject?

Mr. GORMAN. I would like to, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. As well as your general views on the measure?

Mr. GORMAN. I would like to.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed in your own way.

Mr. GORMAN. I will say, in reply to your question, that we have made considerable progress since the N.R.A. There are in the textile industry over 1,000,000 textile workers. The cotton textile industry has about 500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the number in the woolen industry, the woolen textile? The cotton textile industry, you say, is about 500,000?

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Then there is the woolen, and then there is the linen and the other textiles.

Mr. GORMAN. The hosiery and silk goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The rayon and the others.

Mr. GORMAN. I might say, Senator, that we have discovered, in the preparation of codes, that there are approximately 100 codes within the textile industry, pointing out the diversification of the industry. They are so numerous it is somewhat unbelievable to the ordinary observer. But the cotton and woolen, of course, and the silk, predominate. Rayon is becoming more extensive throughout the country. There are approximately 50,000 rayon makers, workers who make rayon. It is a comparatively new industry.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the raw proudct?

Mr. GORMAN. That is, making the rayon.

The CHAIRMAN. Which is the basic product?

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. For the making of rayon yarn and rayon cloth.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes. The cotton textile industry, being the largest division of the industry, was noted for the methods of exploitation prior to the code. We recognized the advancement, the betterment that the N.R.A. gave us in the way of increasing the minimum wages from approximately $8 to $12 in the South, and $13 in the North. We believe that was progress.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees were affected by that provision in the textile cotton codes, approximately?

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, I would say, off hand, about 50 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty percent of the employees?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, it has been represented in some quarters that that increase to the underpaid or smaller paid employees has been offset by the net reduction in the wages of those who were getting higher and larger wages prior to the N.R.A.

Mr. GORMAN. I wanted to discuss that point, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Fine. You see, I have some knowledge of the textile industry.

Mr. GORMAN. I know you have. It did do that, however. It raised the minimum level from approximately $8 to $12 and $13.

The CHAIRMAN. But the absence of any classification of wages in the other classes has resulted in lowering the higher wages.

Mr. GORMAN. It has resulted in the lowering of the maximum wages down to the level of the minimum.

The CHAIRMAN. That is always one of the difficulties in fixing the minimum, isn't it?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes. We argued and contended for the classification and definition of the various operations in the mills, but the administration told us that they were only interested in the setting of minimum standards, minimum wages, and maximum hours, that the question of wages in the higher brackets must be taken care of by the collective bargaining clause in the code. That is the position of the administration, I believe, today. As a matter of fact there is some legal question involved, and some of the administration officials believe if they set the wages in the higher brackets, it might endanger the safety of the recovery program. They told us that.

The CHAIRMAN. That amounted, you think, to an invitation by the National Recovery Administration for all workers to organize and have collective bargaining with the employers in order to protect themselves in the higher brackets of wages.

Mr. GORMAN. We were given that assurance. At first we believed that section 7 (a) did give us the needed protection, but we found, I would say, in the South, in 75 percent of the cases, that the employers accepted section 7 (a) with their fingers crossed, with their tongues in their cheek, and often those who had agreed to bargain with us would bargain and give us nothing. Those who traditionally have pressed us and exploited women and children were defiant enough to tell us, "All right, join the union, if you will, but you do not work here."

The CHAIRMAN. Are the southern textile manufacturers actually and really living up to this minimum wage provision of the code?

Mr. GORMAN. You say the minimum wage, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. Generally speaking, I would say they are. Of course there are exceptions, as you know, on substandard workers.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not know that.

Mr. GORMAN. There are also exceptions for persons who may be termed disabled or incompetent, which we opposed. It permits the lowering of the minimum to 80 percent of the amount. We have cases of thousands and thousands of able-bodied young men and women who have been reduced to $10 a week under that amendment to the cotton code. That went through against our protest.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been a doubling up of the work to meet the cost of the minimum wage?

Mr. GORMAN. There has been an increase in the task and a lowering of the basic piece price levels, making it difficult for the workers to make the minimum wage. There have been some outright increases in the machine load, and an intensification of the stretch-out. There are several ways of stretching out the workers besides increasing the machine load. They can lower the base rate and make the task so impossible that the worker cannot just make the minimum. That is very pronounced in the minimum rate at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. If they cannot make the minimum what happens?

Mr. GORMAN. Well, in some cases they just get what they make, and they are told if they make it next week they will get it. But then again there is the substandard clause which permits them to put them down to the $10 level, $10.40, whatever it is.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of a reduction has taken place in the wages of the employees in the textile mills, the higher brackets, by reason of the codes, approximately?

Mr. GORMAN. Well, that is a difficult question to answer, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it generally a reduction?

Mr. GORMAN. In the South I would say it is.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, the class of men and women, I assume men mostly, loom fixers and others who were getting from $20 to $30 a week, all complain of the reduction?

Mr. GORMAN. That is not exactly true with the loom fixers.

The CHAIRMAN. I should have left them out.

Mr. GORMAN. Take the other operators, for example, the weavers——

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the weavers.

Mr. GORMAN. Who should never be considered as unskilled workers, together with thousands and thousands of workers, are not receiving any more than the minimum wage. You see, that is the fault of not having protection in the higher brackets.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, in the readjustment of the wage on piecework, they have been able to bring these employees, such as the weavers, down to the minimum wage?

Mr. GORMAN. Down to the minimum. There are thousands and thousands of workers in the industry who cannot make any more than $12 or $13 a week, and that is where the collective bargaining clause comes in, that we cannot seem to convince the employers to accept for its true value. They may say, "All right, you can have your union", but when we face the problem of adjusting these conditions, we are just up against a stone wall.

As a matter of fact, I talked with our office in New York this morning, and I was told that there is a petition in there from our organizations in the South clamoring for the calling of a general strike as the only means of protecting the worker against discrimination and the methods now being used by the employer. You see we have an agency in the cotton-textile industry known as the "industrial relations committee" where we send these complaints. We have furnished thousands and thousands of affidavits. I have not any of them here with me this morning; they have them in their possession.

The difficulty is getting adjustments. When one employer is successful in discriminating against our active members and officers it is an encouragement to another employer in the next city or town to practice the same method, and it is growing from day to day, until the clamor is becoming such that the officers of the organization must very shortly recognize the necessity of meeting it. If we cannot get it through the Government agencies we must meet it through giving sanction to the workers to try to force it by way of a strike.

Now this bill would prevent that, Senator. This bill would give us, on the question of collective bargaining, that protection, and on the question of industrial disputes, a national labor board with some power.

The CHAIRMAN. Has it been your experience that you have only been able to get collective bargaining through a strike in the past?

Mr. GORMAN. Well, I would say generally that would be the case.

The CHAIRMAN. Especially when major issues were involved?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose on the minor and lesser complaints, the union would take those up with the employers and you would usually get a settlement.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Where it comes to major issues, that often results in a strike?

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you confronted with the situation that has been complained of here by several witnesses, that the employers, realizing that under the N.R.A. the right to collective bargaining is granted, are seeking to establish company unions that are more or less dominated and controlled by the employers?

Mr. GORMAN. We are not finding that, Senator, much of a difficulty. It exists, but not on the same scale as in the automobile or in the other industries. I might explain my reason why I think we are not, if it would be of an advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. The employers have tried out all the schemes, from outings in the summer, to giving the workers stock in the company, by giving them insurance, by their so-called "welfare work", for example in the South where they built the houses within the shadow of the mill in order that the owner can at all times supervise and know what the workers are doing 24 hours in the day, giving them social activities, dances, and all that sort of thing; paternalistic methods. That has fallen down; that has not proven successful.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the rental in these company houses is cheaper than the rent in an independent home.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; I would say it is cheaper.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. I might also add that in some of the southern villages the houses are very well equipped and livable in some places, and others they are not.

The CHAIRMAN. There is the implied control of the worker by the worker's realization that if he does anything to offend his employer, he may not necessarily lose his job, but he can be put out of the company house.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The employer would not only have to seek a home, perhaps with difficulty, any home at all, but he would have to seek a home where he would have to pay more rent.

Mr. GORMAN. That has happened several times. I say that is, in my opinion, the reason why the employers in our industry have not given more attention to the creation of company unions, because all of that sort of thing has been tried before and it has collapsed.

The CHAIRMAN. Haven't you also had this difficulty, that the wages that have been paid in the textile industry, in many branches of the industry, have been so low that your people could not afford to pay the membership fees of the union?

Mr. GORMAN. That is so, too. That is so today, in a large number of cases. We have numerous complaints of textile workers, for example a man with a large family who must have his wages supplemented from the relief rolls, we have numerous cases of that sort.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any statistics as to the average wage paid to the textile industry workers now?

Mr. GORMAN. On the whole, they are not compiled in that way, Senator. They are compiled by divisions. For example, the cotton textile industry, and the woolen and worsted textile industry, so on and so forth, all of those rates vary.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the wage the cheapest?

Mr. GORMAN. The cotton, of course. Always has been.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. In the cotton textile, prior to the code it was somewhere in the neghborhood of $11.

The CHAIRMAN. The average?

Mr. GORMAN. The average.

The CHAIRMAN. The average wage for every class of employment?

Mr. GORMAN. In that industry. There might be some difference of opinion about that, but we contend that the average throughout the industry before the code was $11. The employers said $12, and their statistics will show that the minimum was raised from approximately $8 to $12 in the South, and $8 to $13 in the North.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that take into consideration the periods when the mill is not operating, or is it assuming that every employee works the full number of working days in the year?

Mr. GORMAN. Those figures that we compiled were based on weekly earnings.

The CHAIRMAN. Actually in the plant?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But practically all of these plants close down in the summer time for two weeks, don't they?

Mr. GORMAN. Most of them do.

The CHAIRMAN. Sometimes a month?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And Christmas and New Years, stock-taking and other purposes, for a week or 10 days.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. I was wondering if the average was reached on the basis of assuming continuous employment, or was reached upon the actual amounts paid out in a given industry.

Mr. GORMAN. Weekly earnings, I would say, Senator, time work.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, they take the pay roll of a week and find out the number of employees and reach the average in that way.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. But as a matter of fact, if that is so, in view of these shut-downs that you referred to, that is quite common in the industry, the total average would not amount to that sum week in and week out.

Mr. GORMAN. No; it would not. We believe this bill, Senator, will give us that opportunity to protect the wages of the workers in the higher brackets. We are really now up against a stone wall with that problem.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you have unions. Isn't that one of your difficulties, that you haven't found the whole industry sufficiently organized to be able to deal with all the employers? In other words, if you have a union at Fall River; you would go and deal with those employers there?

Mr. GORMAN. In Fall River.

The CHAIRMAN. The argument you get is, "Why don't you organize the men in Utica, N.Y., or Fitchburg, Mass., or Lawrence, or New Haven?"

Mr. GORMAN. That is our difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. They say:

You are not organizing there, you are forcing us to go out of business. When you are organized in all these other establishments you may come to us and we may do some business.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right. We have a similar condition now, if I may be permitted to bring it out, Senator, we are now negotiating here in Washington, the arbitration proceedings, with the largest mill in the country, located in Manchester, the Amoskeag Co.

The CHAIRMAN. I know the Amoskeag Co.

Mr. GORMAN. We have friendly relations with this company.

The CHAIRMAN. Some representatives are in the room, so be careful in what you say.

Mr. GORMAN. I know they are, Senator. I want to make this quite clear, that if all the employers in the country took the same attitude that the employers in the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co. are taking, in following out the collective bargaining clause of 7 (a), I think our difficulties would be overcome. They are meeting with us this week, and what you say is the actual fact. We are confronted with that competitive condition.

Now our wages in Manchester are low. We are asking for an increase, but when we do we are faced with the employer in the southern part of the State, the southern part of the country, making this product for miserable starvation wages. We feel the adoption of this bill is the only way we can cure this evil.

The CHAIRMAN. I am pleased that you made the reference to the concern at Manchester, N.H., because my observation has been that it has shown a very conciliatory attitude toward dealing with labor.

Mr. GORMAN. It has been splendid. They will meet us at any time. They are not taking the position, like several employers, "We will meet our committee, but we will refuse to meet all outside representatives." They forget that the employers' associations have spent thousands and thousands of dollars for legal talent, for detective service and for spies, but they object because we, as textile workers—and all of us who represent our industry are textile workers, we come from the mill, we are selected by our fellows to represent them—the employers say, "We will have nothing to do with those fellows who are trying to cause trouble." It is just an evasion, an attempt to destroy the purposes of the recovery program.

The CHAIRMAN. I wanted to ask you about another thing, if you have finished, as I assume you have.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your organization experiencing any difficulty in competing with organizations that are growing up among textile workers that are alleged to support Communistic principles?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; we are combated on every side, Senator, by that influence. These people come in wherever we create an organization, and we not only have to fight the employers but we have to fight them. They are aiming to destroy the organization for the advancement of their own political philosophy.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they actual organizations among some of the workers?

Mr. GORMAN. They haven't anything to speak of, Senator, because just as soon as the workers learn the true nature of the organization, they leave it.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they attempted to organize?

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, they are now in all parts of the country. They have their representatives. They go wherever we go. They attempt to poison the minds of the workers against the representatives of the legitimate labor movement.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, as soon as your representatives go to Manchester, N.H., or Fitchburg, Mass., to start a union, they are there?

Mr. GORMAN. They are in there always.

The CHAIRMAN. And they are combatting your attempt to organize the workers?

Mr. GORMAN. That is right. We have to fight them and fight the employers.

Senator DAVIS. Do you know, Mr. Gorman, who finances the organizations such as the chairman pointed out?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; I am not in a position to say, since the recognition of the Soviet, but we did have definite information that they were subsidized from Russi. .

The CHAIRMAN. And that is the reason why, I suppose, organized labor opposed recognition of Russia, one of the reasons?

Mr. GORMAN. That is one of the reasons, and of course there are others, too, that you are aware of.

The CHAIRMAN. Have these Communistic groups clubs among the workers?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes. They do a lot of house-to-house work. They take young children, 8 or 9 years of age, and train them into the tenets of communism. They take them when they are young.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they maintain schools?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, they do.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they in the open?

Mr. GORMAN. Secret. We are now getting the result of that. These young people are spreading out throughout the country, these young people that have been trained, and they are preaching these destructive philosophies. Their whole attack is against the American labor movement, of course, and they aim to get control of it. I do not believe there is an industry in the country that is more affected with that sort of thing than ours.

The CHAIRMAN. That is why I have asked these questions of you.

Mr. GORMAN. I might bring out at the same time, Senator, it has been said here in Washington, by certain administration officials, that this industry was not thoroughly organized because of that, that we were not receiving the consideration that we should, but they forget that besides fighting the terrific opposition of the employers, with all their political, industrial, and financial resources, we have to fight that communistic element that is always seeking to destroy the unions, that is preaching secession and insidious propaganda to the workers, trying to discourage them. I mean, we have got that opposition. If that was lifted, if this bill was passed, if this National Labor Board was made permanent and it had some force, there isn't any doubt in my mind, Senator, but what we would organize this textile industry close to 100 percent. We have the material now to do it. In the South we have these young men who are learning. There is a whole lot of difference in 10 years. These young men now have greater educational opportunities. They are thinking for themselves. They are not going to be intimidated, they are not going to be scared by the threats of the bosses. They are going through the South and are forming these unions.

The CHAIRMAN. Another difficulty that you have had is the fact that you have had to deal with the newest arrivals from foreign countries to this country, largely.

Mr. GORMAN. Almost every nationality, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. That applies to your industry more than to any other industry.

Mr. GORMAN. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. And there has been, unfortunately, as I have observed it in years that have passed, a philosophy among the employers in the textile industry, that by mixing the racial groups, and employing people who did not speak the same language, they would be in a position to combat organization?

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And thereby have a greater control over their employees.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. And that has added to your problem. In repayment, the employers are now beginning to realize that the seeds of something worse than the trade union have lodged among some of their employees in their plants. Is that true?

Mr. GORMAN. That is true, Senator. I am mindful of the first attempt made to use those tactics. It happened in your own State, where this big company went over into southern Europe and brought these people over here from all parts of the world, they put a Frenchman next to an Irishman, an Italian next to a Pole, they split them up all along in the departments, so they could not talk to each other. The idea of that was, if they talked to each other they would want to organize. But you remember that that company broke down in the spring of 1912. It was ruinous. We did have that to contend with. It is not so extensive today as it was then, of course, on account of the curtailment of immigration. I think we can overcome that, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. And the education that the children have been able to get in our schools, the workers now in 1934, most of them, although they may be of imigrant descent, have had some education in America.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, they have, and because of that they are not subject to that sort of tricks.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other questions by any of the members of the committee?

Senator DAVIS. The majority of workers in the southern textile industry are more or less native, aren't they?

Mr. GORMAN. They are, sir. There are very few foreigners.

Senator DAVIS. Are there any company stores in these corporate owned towns in the South?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, there are some.

Senator DAVIS. Are they compelled to buy in the company stores now?

Mr. GORMAN. Well, I would not say that they are exactly compelled. In some places they are intimidated to the extent that they do, but outright compulsion, I would not say that, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Gorman.

Mr. GORMAN. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. Wagenet.

STATEMENT OF R. G. WAGENET, DIRECTOR, NEW YORK BUILDING CONGRESS, NEW YORK CITY

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name?

Mr. WAGENET. Russell Gordon Wagenet.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. WAGENET. Georgetown, Conn.

The CHAIRMAN. And your official positions, if any?

Mr. WAGENET. I am appearing here, sir, as an individual.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation or profession?

Mr. WAGENET. I am an executive director and have been a labor manager for several years, interested in labor since 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. The description of you on the calendar is you are a director of the New York Building Congress.

Mr. WAGENET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that?

Mr. WAGENET. That is an organization or an association of all the branches of the building industry in metropolitan New York, including labor.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time would you like?

Mr. WAGENET. Just a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members in this organization?

Mr. WAGENET. At the present time about 600 to 700.

The CHAIRMAN. You are appearing here in your individual capacity?

Mr. WAGENET. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to hear you.

Mr. WAGENET. Last fall I was called upon to act as temporary mediator for the National Labor Board in several cases coming before that board. In each of the cases—if you care to, I will name them.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be please to have you do that.

Mr. WAGENET. The first was the strike in one of the large plants of the smoking pipe-making industry. The second was the strike in the shipyards industry in New York Harbor. The third was a strike in the shoe industry in Lynn, Mass., and the fourth was the Ford Co. strike at Edgewater, N.J. In each of these cases, if the present Wagner bill had been a law and equalization of bargaining power had been established, and the clarification of section 7 (a) had been established, there would have been no necessity for weeks of struggle, loss of wages, and loss of production to the manufacturers.

In the case of one of the industries, the smoking pipe, the strike lasted approximately 9 weeks. After the first 3 weeks, the employers in the association called me into conference in New York City, where we spent 6 hours together, at the conclusion of which those employers who had their men still working decided that the way to handle the organization of the industry was to stop all work, in effect create a lock-out that would extend for some weeks. That was done, much against the advice of the mediator. That situation extended for some time, and with great difficulty, and certainly with much hardship, eventually the workers went back under the direction of the Regional Labor Board.

In the case of the shipyards industry, the strike lasted again for several weeks, involving from three to four thousand men, and eventually had to be sent to Washington for settlement. In that case I discussed section 7(a) in detail with the president of one of the largest shipbuilding companies, and he said, in effect, that he recognized what 7(a) meant, but decided that he would disregard it, which, in my opinion, is a denial of the right that (7a) contains as to collective bargaining.

I believe that the Wagner bill by establishing equalization of bargaining power will mean more stable management for American industry. I think it would mean a better security of work for the workingman. I believe without a doubt that it will reduce the unnecessary cost that goes now to pay for such things as secret service in industry. I think that the bill would set up and encourage a cooperative method of settling disputes, which would continue indefinitely, which would, once and for all, after each industry had set up this method which we might term an impartial machinery, which would once and for all stabilize conditions in the industry.

Insofar as labor management is concerned, I look at this largely as a problem of management. I think until genuine collective agreements providing for the contractual relationships of two independent persons are permitted, we will not reach a condition where we can say that American industry is actually on a stable basis. Without that, there will always be the threat of labor trouble from some angle or another.

I have not had very much to do with company unions, only from the point of view of observing and studying some of them. I say that the company union is not the answer to the collective bargaining problem facing the country today.

The CHAIRMAN. The N.R.A. had, as one of its objectives, the elimination of ruthless competition that the producer found in the sale of his merchandise because of different hours, because in a given industry the hours and wages differed. Now I wonder if you are in accord with my view, that the N.R.A. now leaves the producer-employer subject to ruthless conditions in the rate of wages to be paid. One of the witnesses this morning testified that in certain branches of the jewelry industry the wages are fixed and standardized, but there are employers manufacturing the same product, where there is no organization, nobody to collectively bargain with, and they can arrange their wages and make other arrangements with the employees. Why should this first group of employers subject themselves to bargain and to this disadvantage as against those who do not subject themselves to it? Isn't that one of the results of the N.R.A.?

Mr. WAGENET. That they are at a disadvantage?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that they are. The employer who lives up to the spirit of the collective bargaining idea and who recognizes the union and meets the wages simply cannot survive unless all the industry is subjected to collective bargaining.

Mr. WAGENET. No question about it. I can tell you one instance in Massachusetts where that particular point with the shoe industry, would come on to a collective-bargaining basis, where they persuaded that particular employer to deal with the union there.

The CHAIRMAN. Prior to the N.R.A. and previous to the codes there was chiseling by producers and employers in every direction possible in order to outdo the other fellow.

Mr. WAGENET. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. That could be eliminated, but the matter of wages won't be eliminated unless there is collective bargaining among all employers and employees in a given industry.

Mr. WAGENET. Exactly. I was going to make the point, Senator, that without the Wagner bill that competition will continue, in my opinion, and through the Wagner bill, with the equalization of bargaining power, there will be sufficient incentive for the workers and sufficient power given them to standardize the wages throughout the industry for the benefit in the long run of the employers of that industry, and through that will generally bring back the recovery that certainly was the intention of the N.R.A.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. Have you any other observations?

Mr. WAGENET. Just one more point, and that is this: I think that American industry is largely beset by a fear complex. The employer is afraid—not all, of course—by and large employers are afraid of unions and the workmen are afraid of the employers in the unorganized industries, and I think that has a very bad reaction on people generally. I think if one might compare a well organized industry operating under collective bargaining, with one operating under a company union or operating without any form of collective bargaining, one would see the difference at once, both in the organization of the company, the attitude of the company toward its whole management problem, and in the attitude of the workmen, and I think it is a detrimental attitude for any self-respecting community and country.

I have seen so much of that particular thing and I have been so much impressed with it that I mention it here that we should remove the fear psychology, and here through the Wagner bill is an opportunity to do it.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, sir. Mr. Suffern?

STATEMENT OF ARTHUR E. SUFFERN

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name?

Mr. SUFFERN. Arthur E. Suffern.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. SUFFERN. New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. You are listed here as a member of the Federal Council of Churches, New York City, and professor of economics, New York University. Is that correct?

Mr. SUFFERN. I am not a member of the Federal Council of Churches and I am not a professor in New York University. I come representing myself, primarily as a student of labor problems for the last 25 years.

I happen to be a lecturer on labor problems at New York University. I am not a professor but a lecturer on labor problems, and I am not speaking for New York University. Although I have done some work for the Federal Council of Churches I am not speaking for the Federal Council of Churches. I am speaking for myself as a student of labor problems.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to hear you.

Mr. SUFFERN. As an economist, I have been engaged in the study of labor problems, as I say, for the last 25 years. I have worked in factories 6 years and know conditions both from the standpoint of the wage earner and that of management.

In two books, Conciliation and Arbitration in the Coal Industry of America, published in 1915, and the Coal Miner's Struggle for Industrial Status, published in 1926, I have tried to present in plain terms the significance of the struggle for status of the workers in the coal industry. This struggle is typical of what has been going on in many industries for over 75 years. It represents the efforts of supposedly free citizens to acquire an economic basis of democracy comparable to the democracy they are entitled to enjoy politically under a representative form of government.

The difficulty has been that the workers have received very little assistance from Government in equalizing the advantages which employers enjoy under the institution of private property and the protections given that institution by the Constitution. The coal industry has been an outstanding illustration of the chaos which can exist when employers own whole communities and the institutions in them as well as the property devoted to mining. The drive among employers for competitive advantage and the autocracy of management possible under the rights of ownership has reduced the workers on many occasions almost to the status of industrial serfs. On the other hand, the pace of competition set by the most unscrupulous has reduced most of the employers at various times to the stage of bankruptcy. Similar conditions can be pointed to in other industries and the results can be attributed for the most part to the same forces which explain the developments in the coal industry.

The full force of these factors was demonstrated widely throughout the economic system during the depression of 1929–33. The cutting of wages in order to cut prices resulted in a creeping paralysis which threw millions out of work and cut off the market for goods, even for those who were most determined to seek competitive advantage. Business and bank failures finally brought the whole economic system to a standstill.

Only then were those most responsible for these conditions willing to consider a new approach for a savior. However, they were among those most clamorous for a savior. The logical outworking of unlimited competition had brought chaos, and they knew no methods of business and finance adequate to meet the situation. They wanted Government to do something for them, and they forgot temporarily their old slogan of less government in business and more business in government.

Fortunately for them and for everybody else the Nation was headed by a man who believed that the best way to help people is to give them an opportunity to help themselves. This would be a "new deal", indeed, if carried far enough to help those most in need of it, as well as those able to help themselves. However, the "new deal" had hardly gotten under way before it became evident that many employers proposed to make all the use they could of their opportunity to organize and act collectively under their codes, but they did not propose to grant employees the right to organize and bargain collectively for wages and working conditions.

At this point the National Labor Board was created to see whether meaning could be put in section 7 of the Recovery Act. One of the vice presidents of the American Federation of Labor has discovered that "the act is not a labor magna charta. It is merely a pious declaration of the right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively. Then it goes on to assure the right of every employer to determine his own course as he will, regardless of the wishes of the workers. It means that the employer can say, "All right boys; come in and we'll talk it over"; hear the demands for higher wages and say, "Sorry —we can't pay more."

If the men object, he can answer: "We've had our collective bargaining. The act doesn't say anything about reaching an agreement."

This view, moreover, is supported by the interpretations of section 7 rendered by the administrator and the chief counsel of the N.R.A. Furthermore, as far as I can see, there is nothing in the law that requires an employer even to confer with employee representatives. With these handicaps, the remarkable thing is that the National Labor Board has succeeded as well as it has in mediating and conciliating industrial disputes.

The question is, however, whether it is not running against a stone wall when it has to deal with employers who do not propose to deal with unions which the employees organize themselves. In other words, these employers refuse to grant to labor the right which they enjoy themselves of organizing and to selecting whomever they wish to represent them. This is a good illustration of how meaningless some rights are in our economic system unless those to whom the rights belong have the economic power to enforce them. It also illustrates the fallacy of expecting that the rules of the game will be fair, if those with power and selfish interests at stake are allowed to make them. If Government has any justification in modern civilization it is to be found in its duty to protect the weak against the strong and to define and enforce standards which list the level of human relations.

This bill attempts to meet these requirements. It defines as unfair labor practices certain activities and methods devised to deny labor its right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of its own choosing. Furthermore, it defines as an unfair labor practice the refusal of an employer to recognize or deal with the representatives of organized labor.

This is the crux of the employer's power to make ineffective labor's right to organize and bargain collectively through self-chosen representatives. Even if an employer voluntarily refrains from interference and coercion in connection with labor's attempts to organize and select representatives or even if he is prohibited from doing these things by section 7 of the Recovery Act, he can nullify largely if not entirely the right of labor to bargain collectively merely by refusing to recognize and deal with its representatives. Furthermore, strikes are frequently ineffective as a means of compelling an employer to deal with representatives of organized labor. The strike is even a less effective weapon for unorganized workers and company unions which have not accumulated funds needed to pay strike benefits and other expenses of conducting such a struggle.

The result is that labor's right to organize and bargain collectively is largely a fiction. On the other hand the employers through corporation organization, trade associations and now under code authorities are able to act as a unit in setting wage rates and establishing working conditions. This disparity in bargaining power frequently results in an exploitation of labor which drives workers down to a subsistence level or below. If workers cannot find employment and earn living wages employers expect the community to come to the aid of those in distress. This leaves employers free to shirk their responsibilities of so managing the economic system as to make it serve its main purpose of providing the population with the best possible living. In an industrial society worthy of the name, owners and employers should be leaders and builders as well as profit takers. Is there any way of holding them to these responsibilities as long as they are free to refuse to deal with their employees on a basis which enables their employees to protect their economic right to employment at the best possible terms?

Assuming that the opponents of this bill as well as its advocates want to save the capitalistic system, can they do better than to give employees a status of partnership in industry? By partnership status I mean something which establishes rights and obligations, attitudes and methods similar to those expected between partners as business men. Enlightened employers in some industries have found this to be "good business." It gives employees the feeling that they have a stake in the business and enlists their cooperation in eliminating wastes, reducing costs, and improving industrial processes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that where there is a failure of cooperation between the employees and employers, it is due in large part to the class of employees which the employer himself has chosen to work for him, to a large extent?

Mr. SUFFREN. To a large degree, but there, of course, comes in the same questions of leadership in industry.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of the enlightened employer, and my observation has been that where the enlightened employer that you refer to has been able to cooperate and make happy and pleasant relations between himself and his employees, he has had the class of men and women employed by him who were receptive to advice and suggestion and were educated to the extent of being cooperative rather than stubborn I have found that where there is a good deal of trouble between the employer and employees it is in that class to which I referred this morning, where there has been an attempt to amalgamate the different racial groups as employees and where there has not been a meeting of the minds among the employees themselves.

Mr. SUFFREN. A study of the various so-called "cooperative experiments" shows that in most of them the employer has taken what he happened to have. Something happened that introduced the idea that possibly he might get along better with his employees if he made another approach, particularly so in dealing with unions, and one of the outstanding examples of that is the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

The man who sold that idea to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Otto Byer, the engineer, who went to Mr. Willard with Mr. Johnston, the president of the Machinists, and showed Mr. Willard how they could improve the service of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and gain better cooperation out of the employees.

Well, it was not an easy idea to sell; they had something of the idea that it was a Soviet or something like that, but when it was tried out in one of the worst shops on the railroad and had proved to be effective it was then extended over the railroad and has proven to be one of the greatest things that has ever happened as a means of improving the esprit de corps.

The CHAIRMAN. That class of employees is somewhat superior to the class of employees found in many industries? They are American-born, most of them, and they have had a fair general education?

Mr. SUFFERN (sic). Well, you will not find a worse bunch of roughnecks, you might say, among workers in the country than you will find in many of the mining camps, and this very thing I am speaking of has worked out remarkably well with the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co., who took an ordinary bunch of folks as they happened to find them, they were denied unionism but were organized as a union in the United Mine Workers, and they have given a remarkable example of what it is possible to do when workers have good industrial leadership, in respect to improvement of general conditions, both for employers and employees.

As I say, it is good business, not only for particular plants but for whole industries and for the economic system as a whole to establish relations between employers and employees which give employees a greater stake in the returns from industry than they have had in the past. It makes possible the development of attitudes and methods in employer-employee relations designed to establish amicable solution of common problems. Conflicting interests are minimized in an effort to produce and share in greater returns.

In every case, however, where experiments along these lines have been tried, it has been found necessary to give labor a collective status. I would go farther than the bill does and require employers in each industry to deal collectively through representatives with the employees in that industry, if the employees organized a majority and demand that form of dealing. Even under these conditions employees would not have any better status than employers now have under the codes of the Recovery Act.

The main purpose of such collective dealing is to establish minimum standards in wages, hours, and working conditions. Always, where minimum standards have been set, they have been to the advantage of employers as well as to the advantage of employees. Limits have been put on those whose main emphasis has been in cutting wages in order to cut prices. When efforts to establish such limits have been ineffective, the failure can be attributed for the most part to the fact that regulations could not be applied universally throughout an industry. Experience indicates that the necessary universality can be established only by Government whose job it is to make new rules of the game when the old rules are obviously inadequate.

My main point is that the principal emphasis should be on establishing such relations between employers and employees that they will have increasing incentive to work out partnership attitudes and methods. While they are going through the evolution to this end doubtless there will be many occasions where Government should intervene for the purpose of limiting those determined to be arbitrary. At this point the National Labor Board should have an important part to play.

Much evidence exists that indicates the need for prohibiting the various unfair practices enumerated in this bill. These practices range all the way from crude methods of force, intimidation, and violence to willful and subtle means of thwarting the efforts of employees to enlist their fellow-workers in an effective organization. On the question of employer-employee relations many employers are as benighted as farmers who insist on farming by the moon after agricultural experiment stations showed them how to get better results. In many cases the more progressive and enlightened employers have set up experiment stations in employee relations the results from which are available to all employers. Those who refuse to make use of this experience obviously need a guiding hand supported by authority to introduce new methods. Government owes this much to the employees subjected to benighted and autocratic management. If Government's concern should be the greatest good to the greatest number in industry it has been very remiss in allowing a vast working population to be exploited by irresponsible and autocratic employers whose practices have not been subjected to review and restraint.

The unfair practices enumerated in paragraphs 3 to 6 in section 5 are obviously common in connection with company unions. Investigations by impartial research organizations have shown that company unions are frequently used to deny workers the rights assured them by law and court decisions. In many cases the fundamental right of collective bargaining is so limited that it has little value. Management holds the veto over all acts and grants only as much power over wages, hours, working conditions, discipline, and discharge as it sees fit. Employee representatives are in the pay of the company and fear to press aggressively the claims of their constituents. Management representatives talk down the opposition of employees representatives and if necessary resort to reprisals to force docility.

Investigations have shown in some cases that at the election of employee representatives ballot boxes have been passed around by representatives of management and the ballots of employees have been marked. If such methods are not adequate to obtain the kind of employee representatives wanted, management retains the right to discharge them.

Under these circumstances a system of handling evidence of grievances can have little meaning. Employees feel that it is useless to present their complaints to representatives who in turn are afraid to displease foremen and superintendents by carrying grievances to higher officials. Even where cases are carried to higher officials they are frequently slow to reprimand or discipline foremen and superintendents. Thus the tyranny of authority is allowed to defeat the ostensible purpose of an employees representation plan.

When it comes to the establishment of wages and hours neither the employee representatives nor employer representatives can participate in fixing standards throughout an industry. The employer, however, retains the power to force lower standards in order to gain competitive advantage. Thus company unions are inadequate at the very point needed to deal with present day industrial conditions. The level of competition needs to be lifted in order to prevent the decline of an industry to the point where it is at a disadvantage in exchanging its products for the products of all other industries. Since its relative position in the economic system is always expressed in terms of the prices and income it receives, both the employers and employees become poorer and poorer consumers of the products of other industries the more an industry is depressed by unfair competitive and unfair labor practices. Thus in order to balance production and consumption in the economic system there must be not only better distribution of income between employers and employees but the price ratios between the products of the various industries must be such as to permit the maximum number of exchanges of goods.

The employers and employees in the railroad industry have supported legislation under which they have obligated themselves to make every effort to adjust wages, hours, working conditions in conference between representatives designated by the respective parties for that purpose. The employers are obligated not only to deal with employee representatives but to refrain from any interference or coercion in connection with their selection and the self-organization of the employees. There is every reason why the employers and employees in all industries should have a similar status. As in the railroad industry they need a national tribunal to supervise their relations. The National Labor Board as proposed in this bill would fill that need.

If the Board needs the support of the courts to enforce its rulings it should have it. It is to be hoped that the Board will be helped and not handicapped unnecessarily by the courts. When labor is given the improved status defined by the bill the courts will be given an opportunity to give more consideration to the claims and needs of labor than they have in the past under the law of conspiracy. If employers are to have greater freedom from prosecution under the law of conspiracy as codified in the antitrust acts, employees should have greater privileges.

In short, I regard the bill as one of the most significant efforts ever made in the United States to improve the status of labor. Employers will not be denied any rights necessary to their proper functioning in an industrial society. Insofar as they may be limited in the exercise of autocratic power, the result in the long run will be to their advantage as well as to the advantage of society. A regime of cooperative dealing between employers and employees offers much more than constant struggle which accentuates the division between classes.

In conclusion I would like to call attention to some statements that are being made by the automobile manufacturers now in denouncing the Wagner labor bill and point out something which it seems to me this committee should have in mind in connection with the stand that they are taking on it and which they are publishing in the press, this propaganda which they are paying for as full-page advertisements, one of which I have as an exhibit here.

In connection with this full page advertisement in the New York Times on March 20, entitled "To Employees of the Automobile Industry", which is the way it is designated, I would like to raise the question with the committee as to whether they think this is done primarily to appeal to the employees not to strike, as the ostensible purpose is, publishing it in New York and elsewhere, or whether it is done primarily to bring public pressure on this committee in connection with the Wagner labor bill.

The automobile manufacturers declare that "the bill would in effect unionize every industrial worker in the country, regardless of his own wishes, and would set up a labor dictatorship with power and authority exceeding anything yet experienced in the United States and it would result in giving a labor union official virtual domination over American industrial life. Everybody, from the farmer with more than one man in his employ to the larger manufacturer with thousands dependent upon him for their livelihood, might be subject to the whim of some irresponsible professional labor organizer."

This is a good illustration of the attitudes of benighted employers toward organized labor. No impartial student of labor problems seeks to justify what are evidently abuses of power by organized labor. But speaking of dictatorship and monopoly of employment, who has it now? The employers not only have a monopoly on jobs but as a rule an employee has to accept whatever terms dictated.

Speaking of the domination of irresponsible labor organizers, could it be as great as the irresponsible domination of the management of large corporations which not only dominate and exploit labor but dominate and exploit stockholders by maintaining a self-perpetuating industrial hierarchy that increases its salaries and bonuses in a period of depression at the same time it is cutting dividends and wages? Industrial dictators operating on such a basis are not in a position to cast any stones at unions and labor officials who, the industrialists say, are "dipping heavily into the pocketbooks of the men and women of America." Nor should they be allowed to assume that they can set themselves up as the self-appointed protectors of "the best interests of the employees."

The automobile manufacturers declare that—> higher prices, constant labor trouble, strikes, and lockouts would be among the consequences of this act. The effect also would be to subject the whole country to the dangers of a universal closed shop and a national strike involving the workers in every industry in the United States.

It may be asked who does the exacting of higher prices now? Who has the power not to turn hundreds of thousands of workers out in the street when the owners do not see an opportunity for profit? This is a closed shop with a vengeance which falls not only upon their employees but upon the consuming public.

Furthermore, the automobile manufacturers reveal how little in sympathy they are with the "new deal" which seeks to give more people employment and increase their purchasing power to aid recovery. Although they boast of the high wages in their industry and the increased employment they have given, they fail to mention that high labor costs do not necessarily accompany high wages. If employers are efficient, labor costs decrease and wages can be increased. But the automobile manufacturers evidently do not want to share with their employees, as much as they should, the increased returns from the industry.

They declare that—> no industry, entirely union in character, has made substantial progress in this country, and the effect of the Wagner bill is to force closed-shop unionism on all industry.

They should be asked to point to an industry "entirely union in character." Furthermore, most industries are nonunion in their labor policies and many of them are very unprogressive. The Hoover commission appointed to study wastes in industry attributed most of the wastes to management. Those who know most about the struggles of workers to gain a collective status know that organized labor has had very little opportunity to cooperate in the development of progress. The employers have been too busy trying to cut wages in order to cut prices and trying to break down working standards and the unions themselves so that the employers could regain their power to exploit the workers under unlimited autocratic management.

However, some employers who deal with organized labor have discovered that there is nothing about organized labor as such to hinder progress. On the contrary they have found that when employers want to enlist their workers in a plan of cooperation in reducing costs and improving processes, the labor organization is a very convenient means to this end. They have discovered also that organized labor is just as responsive or more so than company unions which are regarded as so essential by many of the big industrialists, automobile manufacturers included.

If the automobile manufacturers were as progressive as they pretend to be they would know about these things and would be making use of a new discovery instead of wasting their efforts in pursuing an outmoded philosophy of industrial relations. They may be leading the world in technical matters but in industrial relations they are backwoodsmen.

Why are they not as quick to learn from other people's experience in industrial relations as they are to copy new features of cars? Doubtless the answer is that they are so fearful of losing some of their power to manipulate human beings as they do machines that they are blinded to the fact that human beings are different from machines. After many years of study I am convinced that there is much more to this statement than appears on the face of it. Many hard-boiled employers treat their employees worse than they do their machines. They do not have to invest any capital in wage workers. I would like to challenge such employers to give the same careful study to ways and means of getting the most out of their employees that they apply to their mechanical equipment. If they accept the challenge they will discover that they have been wasting one of the most valuable assets at their command. And they can have this asset for much less money than they invest in their machines.

The absurd thing about the refusal of hard-boiled industrialists to treat their employees as human beings is that they refuse to apply to them the very attitudes and methods they have found necessary in order to get the most out of those with whom they are most closely associated, particularly those they regard as more nearly equals than they do the general run of their employees.

If the industrialists of this country devoted more of their time to discovering what their job is as leaders and constructive builders of a coordinated system of production and consumption they would find that they have not any time to waste fighting labor. The time, effort, and expense devoted to fighting labor would yield much bigger returns if devoted to trying to understand the problems of labor and to enlisting labor in a program of cooperation. In fact the industrialists by fighting labor are passing up one of the biggest opportunities ever offered any controlling group in the history of civilization. The labor forces of this country are not indoctrinated with destructive views. On the contrary they are very ready to respond to suggestions and plans for making the capitalistic system more workable and equitable. They are asking to be treated as citizens who have some economic as well as political rights. Only those drunk with power and with determination to exploit the workers can fail to see this.

If the industrialists do not rise to their opportunity, Government will find that it faces the supreme task of throwing its weight against forces which threaten its overthrow. Looking at the whole situation in perspective it would seem that at present the chief threat to the overthrow of representative government comes from employers who are determined to maintain their economic hierarchy and if necessary mold the Government to suit their purposes. This administration has the support of the masses and it should use the occasion to establish institutions which will promulgate welfare and democracy as needed in relation to changing conditions. We are at the crossroads to a new era and if the present Government does not lead in building new foundations it will sson find iself without followers. A National Labor Board as provided in this bill should stand as a bulwark against the abuse of economic power, whether by employers or employees.

I think that is all I have, Senator, except that I would like to see that advertisement go in the record as an exhibit with a question as to what its main purpose is.

The CHAIRMAN. You quoted from it before you made your reply?

Mr. SUFFREN. No; that was another thing I quoted from. What I quoted from was a progaganda statement in the New York Times of March 17.

The CHAIRMAN. You would like it inserted in the record, the advertisement of the automobile manufacturers, published in the New York Times?

Mr. SUFFREN. The New York Times of March 20.

The CHAIRMAN. An appeal to the employees not to strike? It may go in the record.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

[From New York Times, Mar. 20, 1934]

TO EMPLOYEES OF THE AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

This is what is happening:

The American Federation of Labor and other outside unions are trying to force you to join their union and pay dues to support professional labor leaders.

They are trying to destroy the present satisfactory arrangement between you and the management under which your right to collective bargaining is fully recognized.

These employee representation plans—which the labor leaders call company unions—have been set up by more than 80 percent of the employees themselves. They are working satisfactorily. Any one of you can see his supervisory officer at any reasonable time and settle any questions that may arise. Most of the questions that have come up have been peacefully settled.

No one has to join any union. Your employment does not depend on your membership or nonmembership in any organization. It depends on merit alone.

The outside labor leaders are trying by force, by coercion, by intimidation of you and your families and threat of strike to make you join their union. Regardless of what you want, these labor leaders want the right to speak for all of you. They want dues-paying members.

But the N.I.R.A. does not say that the American Federation of Labor or any other union shall speak for you.

It is up to each one of you to decide for yourself whether these outside unions can secure any right that you cannot secure yourself.

It is up to you to say whether you want to surrender to professional labor leaders your own right to deal with the management of your companies.

To get what they want, regardless of what you want, the American Federation of Labor is using its usual weapons, namely a threat to call a strike.

Sunday's newspapers quoted William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, as saying:

> The question as to whether a strike in the automobile industry involving more than 100,000 workers shall or shall not occur on Wednesday morning, March 21, rests with the automobile manufacturers. Their decision will decide the question. The cause of the strike is directly traceable to the attempt of the automobile manufacturers to impose company unions upon their workers and to force them to accept.

That is not the issue.

You know that the companies have not coerced you into employee representation plans.

You well know that you have taken part voluntarily in setting up employee representation plans.

You know, too, that hours have been shortened voluntarily to an annual average of 36 hours per week, that wage rates have been increased more than 30 percent within the past year, and in many cases are higher than they were in 1929 at the peak of prosperity, and that twice as many men are at work today as during the depression.

That is only one fundamental issue here namely:

Whether the automobile industry is to be run by the American Federation of Labor or any other outside union;

Whether you have to get a union card in order to work in these plants;

Whether your job and your advancement in the industry will be based on merit;

Whether the employee representative shall be ousted in favor of outside labor leaders who have interests to serve other than your interests.

If the strike comes, it won't be because you want to strike.

The strike threat comes from the American Federation of Labor and not from the automobile workers.

Let there be no misunderstanding as to the companies' attitude toward the automobile representation plans.

The automobile manufacturers intend to abide by the employee representation plans as they may be modified from time to time by the employees themselves.

And bear this in mind, the automobile industry is unquestionably leading the way back to prosperity. People are buying more automobiles than they have been for years.

This increased demand means more jobs at good wages; not only in the automobile industry but in thousands of other industries, supplying materials and parts to the automobile manufacturers.

A strike at this time will not only work hardship on you and your families but will interfere with the recovery efforts of the President of the United States.

The automobile industry has reached its present state of high efficiency, low cost, with the consequent wide demand for its products, high wages, and plentiful jobs without the help of the American Federation of Labor and without any serious labor trouble.

Unasked and unwanted, the American Federation of Labor is now trying to get control of this industry and destroy what we have taken years to build.

This industry does not intend to yield to such un-American and unpatriotic procedure.

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the stenographer to insert in the record two letters I have received dealing with this subject.

(The letters referred to are as follows:)

THE JOHN W. COWPER CO.,
Buffalo, N. Y., March 15, 1934.

CHAIRMAN SENATE LABOR COMMITTEE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I understand you are holding hearings on the bill recently presented by Senator Wagner, giving broader powers to the National Labor Board.

May I have the privilege of offering you a copy of a letter (hereto attached) I have written to Senator Wagner giving my views on this subject, and respectfully ask that this letter be made a part of the record.

With great respect, I am

Yours very truly,

J. W. COWPER, President.

THE JOHN W. COWPER CO., INC.,
Buffalo, N. Y., March 13, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER.
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read with a great deal of interest your bill, introduced in the Senate on March 1, giving broader powers to the National Labor Board. In offering the following comments, which I hope you will find constructive, I wish you first to understand that we are employers of union labor, therefore I can speak without prejudice.

Under section 3, paragraph 2, "Definitions", the bill states, "It shall not include United States or any State municipal corporation or other governmental instrumentality. This exception may be reasonable enough if it applies purely to governmental agencies but where these governmental divisions are engaged in pursuits, competing with private enterprise, then there should be no exception and such agencies should be under the same restrictions as a corporation or private employer.

As an example of what I mean, where different departments of the Government are engaged in construction projects, buying materials and hiring labor, doing such work without guaranties as to cost, in competition with private enterprise. The same is true of municipal or governmental utilities, such as power, light or other plants of this nature not affecting safety and health; the Navy Department in their yards constructing new ships, running foundries, paint plants and other activities, in direct competition with private enterprise. Also such agencies as the Tennessee Valley Authority and many other governmental agencies, building and operating various projects, that are directly competing with private enterprise.

Of course, this act, whether designed to or not, in actual practice will mean legalized unionism. It may be desirable that labor should be protected against unfair practices of many employers but it is not desirable to attempt to cure this evil by a law that will create greater evils on the other side.

Under section 5, paragraph 6, I quote, "Nothing in this act shall preclude an employer and a labor organization from agreeing that a person seeking employment shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join such labor organization." This practically eliminates the employment of any other than members of the Union because in actual practice, the union will not agree to this. I think this part of the clause should read: "Nothing in this act shall preclude the employer from employing a person seeking employment who is not a member of the labor organization and the employer shall not in any way attempt to prevent such employee from joining such labor organization."

Section 207 raises the question as to representatives of employees. Under unionisms the representative of the employee is elected by all members of the union or local and employees of many individual employers often may have little or no say in the selection of their representatives and, as you may know, in many cases coercion is used by labor organizations in electing their officers. While there are many capable fairminded men representing labor organizations, there are also many who take the job solely for the purpose of racketeering. Being from New York, you must know that this has been so in many of the building trades unions.

So it seems to me if you are going to legally establish the union and give them the broad powers that this bill will do in actual practice, then as an employer, I say groups of employees should be entitled to elect their own representative from among themselves.

By all means, if such a bill is enacted, it should go further and safeguard the interest of the employer to the same extent that you propose to safeguard those of the employee. To do this would mean to prohibit the calling of a strike for any cause whatever and the matter shall be heard by the Labor Board, or such of its agencies as are competent to act, and a decision rendered by them. The Labor Board must have the power to enforce its mandates on labor as well as on the employer. By the same token, lockouts should be prohibited in the same manner.

Probably in order to do this, it will be necessary to enact legislation compelling the Labor Unions to incorporate, giving them in a legal way responsible representatives with whom to deal. If it be admitted that the present methods of dealing with labor need correcting, I feel that in correcting them, we should do so in a really constructive manner and not legislate a favoritism for labor that will create an evil on the opposite side as great as we have had in the past. In other words, if you are going to legislate a correction of these things, make it equal, equitable, and just for both sides.

I trust my remarks will be of some help to you, and I have the honor to be

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
March 19, 1934.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Committee on Education and Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I quote you from a letter received from Mr. William B. Terry, 190 Magnolia Avenue, Hillsdale, N. J.

"I believe that industry and labor would be materially benefited and recovery would be speeded up if we had legislation along the following lines:

"1. A national minimum wage law, with no differential for any section of the country.

"Any manufacturer who has to compete with plants located in the South, for example, will verify that it is impossible today to successfully compete and that if a differential is going to be maintained in the South it is going to mean removing manufacturing plants to that area to take advantage of the materially lower manufacturing costs. This means a further shifting of industry and an increasing of the unemployment problem in the areas affected.

"2. A national maximum working hour law, with no differentials or exceptions.

"This does not mean that productive machinery cannot work two or three shifts if necessary, but that labor can only be employed a maximum number of hours per week.

"3. All collective bargaining organizations, whether affiliated with the A. F. L. or voluntary associations of employees within a plant, be incorporated and that their books be audited by a certified public accountant and that the actual expense be prorated among the members. The payment of fixed dues, usually dependent upon the average pay roll of the employees, had led to many abuses and should be prohibited. The subject of sick benefits, unemployment benefits, and old-age pensions should not be made a part of legislation of this type, which affects only strictly industrial relationships."

The above being Mr. Terry's views, it occurred to me your committee would like them for the record.

If you wish Mr. Terry to appear before your committee, I shall be glad to so advise him.

Yours very truly,

HAMILTON F. KEAN.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish to announce that the last meeting for hearing those who are in favor of the bill will be held tomorrow at 10 o'clock, and on Monday morning the opposition will commence their presentation of their views.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to renew my request at this time which I made last week.

The CHAIRMAN. You are opposed to this bill?

Mr. DUNN. As the representative of the Trade Union Community League.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you opposed to this bill?

Mr. DUNN. I wish to be heard before these employers that are listed with me in your committee schedule. We were the first organization to say that section 7 (a) would not do what it said it would.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your organization?

Mr. DUNN. The Trade Union Community League.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that one of the organizations which have been referred to here as communistic?

Mr. DUNN. I have not heard it referred to here as communistic, but the press refers to it as communistic occasionally.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you admit or deny it?

Mr. DUNN. It is not a communist organization. It is a trade union representing 125,000 organized workers.

The CHAIRMAN. I would be very glad to give you a hearing. I cannot do it this morning, because several others have made that request and I have denied them. I do not want to hear you until after the proponents of the bill have concluded their testimony. Perhaps tomorrow morning after we have finished with the witnesses that are scheduled we might hear you.

Mr. DUNN. The thing I am objecting to especially, Senator, is that we are listed in your committee schedule with such organizations as the United States Steel Corporation, whose motives for opposing this bill are certainly not ours.

The CHAIRMAN. You may list the witness as representing a branch of organized labor that is opposed to this measure. Is that right?

Mr. DUNN. Yes. When can I be heard, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. If we finish with the other witnesses tomorrow morning we will hear you then. We will attempt to arrange it so that you will not be contaminated by the employers who appear in opposition.

Mr. DUNN. It is not exactly contamination but it might give rise to a certain misunderstanding.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(Whereupon, at 12:30 p.m., the committee recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, Mar. 22, 1934, at 10 a.m.)

TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1934

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a.m., in room 335, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C., Senator David I. Walsh (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Metcalf, Davis.

Present also: Senator Robert F. Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Mr. Hogue?

STATEMENT OF RICHARD W. HOGUE

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name, please?

Mr. HOGUE. Richard W. Hogue.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. HOGUE. 125 Third Street NE.

The CHAIRMAN. Washington?

Mr. HOGUE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are listed as a director of workers' education, Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor.

Mr. HOGUE. Formerly a director of workers' education.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation now?

Mr. HOGUE. Director of the independent legislative bureau here in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Representing whom?

Mr. HOGUE. At this hearing representing only the request of Senator Wagner after knowing of my work with the division of labor. I represent no organization, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time would you like?

Mr. HOGUE. I want to hurry through briefly. They told me yesterday I would be on at 11 o'clock, and I was getting ready a very effective little statement when they told me to come at 10; so it is not ready.

The CHAIRMAN. Who told you to come at 10?

Mr. HOGUE. The clerk, at Senator Wagner's request. I suppose they had more important witnesses that they wanted to get out of the way. I will try to be brief, but it is difficult when you are hurried and have not formulated things effectively.

The importance of this measure, it seems to me, looms very much, not only in itself, but as a means to an end. In other words, there are some of us who feel that measures like this, and particularly this measure, have their greatest importance in the end toward which they take us, rather than in the immediate subject of present difficulties, and it seems to me that the facts of today justify us in feeling that unless some such step is taken as this, the end will not be desirable to peace-loving people, above all to justice-loving people, and will come in ways that very few of us will relish. That is not a threat but simply a statement of fact, that where industrial conditions will continue over too long a period as they are in a country, the inevitable result, unless you have a body of possessing and owning tyrants and a body of subservient slaves, is that you do have very serious difficulty. We are having that difficulty today with the strikes that are being threatened.

The first thing I wanted very briefly to say is that my experience in Pennsylvania led me to feel that few of us fully appreciate, Senator, what is apt to happen, what is now happening. The industrial system of America has grown up with one primary, dominating, and determined motive, the motive of profit.

The industrial realm of America has never been regulated on any large scale, nor ever been given proper attention from a standpoint of human rights. The result is, therefore, that we have an owning and possessing and a dictating class in the main, and either a subservient or a protesting and a rebelling class. Democracy cannot exist with that, that is all.

In the midst of a political democracy, where we have a right to vote for everybody from the lowest magistrate to the President, you have an industrial autocracy where the right of industrial franchise is generally denied, where when it has been granted, it has been granted as the result, not of the far-seeing wisdom of those in control of industry, but as the result of pressure and frequently as the result of violence and suffering.

The thing that makes me feel so deeply about this, and that I have a right to say a word on it, is what I saw in Pennsylvania, and very recently, which in a more or less degree exists over the country, certainly bodes ill for all of us.

I have seen workers, American citizens, men whom I have lived among and known well enough to admire, and come to love, seen them with their families, wives, and little kids, just as we have ours, seen them not only oppressed with burdens that in a decent society and in a profitable country ought never to be permitted, their children deprived of proper education, themselves deprived of jobs without any fault of their own, living in an atmosphere of industrial insecurity, and human anxiety, so much so that if we did not have a sense of the tragic it would be humorous in a country like this.

I have been among them when they have never known whether the man next to them was a spy, an agent provocateur, or one of the contemptible types of men that are regularly employed in certain industrial disputes.

In other words, we have in America commercialized strike-breaking agencies, where one side in the industrial world, by the power of finance, employs representatives of this recognized agency in Chicago, New York, and elsewhere, in order to break-down the right of other men to organize and express themselves through the power of collective bargaining. I have seen these spies, I have talked to them, I have seen a street-railway strike broken up, strike breakers brought in specially guarded trains from New York, 1,000 of them.

I have seen when those men got out at the station in Altoona then destroy everything in sight that they could not eat or smoke, and when the police tried to arrest them, I have seen them attack the police, and while living in Harrisburg, I learned when they wired the chief of police in Harrisburg to stop the train on its way to New York and arrest the men, instead of that, influence of the industrial leaders upon the Pennsylvania Railroad was such that they not only did not arrest them, but sent them to New York, and kept the facts out of the newspapers.

I have been up in the mine regions and lived in the tents in the yards of miners. I remember one fine Scotch family where the husband worked in mines underneath ground formerly owned by the family of the wife, and where by methods very common in our industrial world that family lost those mines, and where those self-respecting Scotch people, once the possessors of the very land beneath which the wealth of the coal rested, were these slaves of a nonunion company, receiving treatment that was almost unbelievable, where the meetings that we held were intimidated by the firing of shotguns and the burning of the cross by the Ku-Klux Klan.

I have seen those dignified, respectable, decent citizens, members of the church, the owners of the industry, not hesitate to stoop to methods that are simply incomprehensible in any enlightened age.

What I am leading up to is this—I do not want to take any more time—that the natural reaction in the minds of the workers frequently is bad. You cannot get a group of people who depend upon the labor of their lives for the support of their families, the education of their children, and the security of their future, you cannot get them baffled and beaten and oppressed and maltreated and exploited at every turn unless you get evil results in their own hearts at times. So, you get articles like this in yesterday's paper, when Mr. Raymond Kloever portrays the labor difficulties that the administration is now facing, and in it gives the last section—I think this leads directly to the situation—gives the last section to an account of the racketeer in the labor movement.

It is a very vivid and a very interesting account of the amount of salary, the amount of rake-off, that certain labor leaders get.

Surely it is true. When you get a group of people, themselves very largely deprived of education that would make for sanity of thought and self control, fighting all their lives against conditions that are not only inhuman but are monstrously unnecessary and unjust, you are going to have things like that develop.

This is my point, Senator, that these kinds of things are going to continue, so it seems to us, unless one definite thing happens; and that definite thing is not a conversion of your capitalist class to the viewpoint of a perfect development nor the development of your labor class to the viewpoint of perfect human conduct; we have got to have an orderly, systematic industrial arrangement that does simply one thing, that no longer inhibits human beings who have enough intelligence and enough interest to labor their lives in an industry, from the full expression of their collective opinions and their collective needs, and you cannot have that, it seems to us, short of what this bill is aiming at. I am not speaking now of its technical provisions. How important that is is shown on all sides.

The fundamental aspects of the measure before you and its long range effects are, I think, of primary importance. With all of the promise that the N.R.A. holds for labor it was scarcely launched before industrial unrest broke out in the great coal fields of Pennsylvania, where strikes and the closing of mines were followed by open conflict and bloodshed. What is the cause of this sudden clogging of the machinery of recovery? What is the meaning of labor's attitude?

The explanation has its roots in the past. Labor has too often seen the promise of a new day dissipated. There was such a promise in the war-time administration of President Wilson. To security of employment and adequate wages were added the zeal of a great cause and the hope of a larger life for the workers. The post-war period brought disillusionment and the loss of all their gains. It revealed the war itself as a mad delusion that made a mockery of their patriotism and all but wrecked the world, burying the workers beneath the wreckage.

Labor saw the victory and peace it helped to win turned to chaos and conflict. It witnessed the collapse of the employers' devotion to the public good. It saw profiteering, masked as patriotism, produce over 2,000 war-made millionaires. It saw the power of their great wealth used for the destruction of organized labor. Through the national "open-shop movement" employers sought to close the doors of industry to union labor. Through the "yellow-dog contract" and the abuse of the injunction they sought to force the workers into involuntary servitude. Then came the great financial crash, destroying millions of jobs and bringing sweatshops, starvation wages, bread lines, and all the human misery of a deep, prolonged depression.

Rightly or wrongly, intelligent labor leaders see the sequence of cause and effect in these events and proclaim it to their followers. Rightly or wrongly, they cherish a bitter distrust not easily uprooted.

The N.R.A.'s open recognition of the full right of collective bargaining was hailed by most labor leaders as a new Magna Carta for the workers. Again the hope for a new day seemed about to dawn. Powerful opposition arose to meet them. Many employers hastened to organize company-controlled unions in order to shut out the American Federation of Labor. Its representatives were barred from approaching the workers in many industries. Industrial codes were formulated which stripped the right of collective bargaining of all meaning. The steel industry's code actually proposed that the Government place its stamp of approval on the company union. That industry owns or controls large coal companies. The latent distrust of labor flared into flame in the coal fields of Pennsylvania.

Wage earners and their families constitute a majority of the population. Politically they have the rights of a majority. Whether they exercise these rights wisely or not, they possess them. Industrially they find themselves practically disfranchised, often dispossessed of their human rights. In many lands, notably in England, organized labor is recognized and dealt with as an integral part of the industrial system. In America it has had to fight for every modicum of recognition and every inch of progress. Its fight has been waged against the most powerful antilabor forces in the world. Nowhere else have the workers encountered such a combination of organized wealth and industrial power, with their control over jobs and their influence on politics, the press, public opinion, and the courts.

There is no parallel to the reign of the industrial autocracy in a political democracy which has existed in America. That such a situation should not and must not continue is the contention of responsible labor leaders of this country. That contention is sustained by a few leading industrialists as well as by competent historians and students of economic and industrial problems. Will the effect of the National Recovery Act be to close the era of industrial autocracy? Will it go further and lay the foundations for a new industrial order?

Industrial leaders and employers as a whole must face these searching questions. Will they continue to regard the workers as mere hirelings, to be controlled by coercion and the fear of unemployment? Will they continue to act on the assumption that the primary function of business is to create security and furnish profits for the few? Will their attitude toward the N.R.A. be that of enforced submission to be succeeded by renewed hostility and opposition to organized labor? Will they conclude that their own best interests are largely dependent on the conditions and the state of mind that prevail among the great body of wage earners? Will they unite in conserving the orderly processes, cooperative spirit, and human gains attained under the emergency recovery program? Will they concede to labor the same full rights of collective organization and action which they themselves exercise? How will they meet the growing claim in behalf of the workers that they are partners in a joint enterprise and are justly entitled to a more equitable share of control and of the product of their own labor?

What is the general public reaction to the Government's exercise of direct and rigid control over industry and to such proposed legislation as this? A marked change is noticeable in the public psychology. There is less faith in the ability and the character of financial and industrial leaders. Were they not either chiefly responsible for creating or wholly unable to prevent the orgy of artificial inflation and wild speculation that produced the stock-market crash, with all its disastrous results? Have they not remained impotent in the face of business stagnation and wide-spread unemployment? What contribution have they made to their Government except to evade taxation and oppose legislation for the public good? These are common questions today and those who ask them answer them. The answer finds expression partly in strong approbation of the Government's drastic control of business and industry.

More significant still is the changed attitude toward labor. There are several reasons for this. Unemployment has spread rapidly and widely beyond the ranks of wage earners. The professional and salaried classes must share this bitter experience of the workers. Class-conscious security has weakened with its familiar maxim that only the worthless and lazy are among the idle. The sharing of common hardships tends to break down isolation and develop a sense of understanding and of common interest. The public is feeling the effects of unemployment on those who are employed. It has increased the cost of family budgets. It has exhausted local and State resources. It has compelled the levying of additional taxes to supply relief. Through the depletion of purchasing power it has choked the channels of trade and prolonged the depression.

All these factors have helped to create a new public psychology, keenly conscious of the close relation between pay envelopes and community purchasing power. Labor's demand for shorter hours and a living—and spending—wage does not appear so unusual. Higher wages mean better trade. Shorter hours mean more people employed and more money in circulation. The right of collective bargaining to attain these ends is no longer the arbitrary claim of a selfish group. It is a step toward industrial peace.

Will this changed public attitude persist when prosperity returns? Or will it give way to the old forces of narrow self-interest and class prejudice that have always failed to conserve the social gains which make for order, stability, and justice in the industrial world? The answer to this depends largely on the leadership of the Government. The fate of this measure will constitute a crucial test of this leadership. The consequences of its defeat would be very serious indeed.

I wish to submit the following brief quotations from statements made in London to an American research group.

Former Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald:

> No country will ever have peace whilst its work-class masses have no responsibility for their own conditions * * * The piece of work which now has to be done is to take the workman into full social partnership, to use him not only as a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, but as a colleague in the management of industry. * * *
> We are seeing a breakdown of the private ownership of labor.

Typical of the position of British employers in general is that of Mr. B. Seebohm Browntree, managing director, Rountree Cocoa Works:

> Now, the first thing we want to get into our minds is that industrial unrest is not an inevitable condition of industry. People seem to think that we must have it always with us, like the law of gravitation. But that is nonsense. Industrial unrest is a serious reflection on the intelligence and ability of the employing classes. It is a grave indictment of their efficiency at their job.
>
> * * * Now, I suggest to you that it is perfectly possible to eliminate industrial unrest, in the sense in which we generally use the term, that of a great upheaval in industry. I do not mean mere grousing, nor do I mean the spirit that perpetually strives after something better. That is not unrest, it is merely growth and development. The unrest that we are concerned with means lockouts, and strikes, and incessant friction, and the paralysis of labor and industry. That is what we must eliminate.
>
> I suggest that if you want industrial peace, there is no use in sitting still and waiting for it to arrive. * * *
>
> The third point, and to my mind the most important, is the economic insecurity of labor. I think that if we were to seek out the central cause of industrial unrest among the workers we should find that it was their sense of insecurity, their feeling that their energy was merely a chattel to be bought and sold, and that there was no regard for them as human beings, since as soon as ever their labor ceased to be required they were cast on the scrap-heap. Unrest will not be allayed so long as that state of things continues. * * *
> My fourth point is the status of the worker. Both America and England are ostensibly democratic countries. As my boat entered the Hudson River I saw the great Liberty statue, and liberty is preached a good deal in America. We preach it a good deal here. We tell people that they are members of a democratic nation. Yet when those to whom we have been talking about democracy enter the factory gates, liberty ceases. Take the case of a man who has been 20 or 30 years in a factory, a man of mature years. He sees a notice about which he has never been consulted, making fundamental changes in his conditions of work, and perhaps he demurs. He is told, "If you don't like it, you know what to do. There are plenty of other places where you can look for a job."
> All the conditions of work are determined in the manager's office, and then the notices are put up on the wall. What about this democracy? Where does it come in? The workers do not see it here, and yet the war taught them to live and die for it. They were told that their country could not do without them, and that they had rights as well as duties. Now, they are asking for a recognition of those rights and for a real voice concerning the conditions under which they work, and not merely a few extremely superficial details.

The moment you allow masses of working people to become educated, as we do, and put a premium on it, even having compulsory education for children, you spoil a good worker and ruin a citizen unless you at the same time let his mind function in his interest. You cannot put this portion of his life which occupies most of his time and to which he gives most of his energy into a separate compartment from all the rest of his compartments of his whole life, and tell him he cannot organize collectively and fight for himself.

Now, the company unions, as I have seen them in Pennsylvania, and I have seen many of them, are makeshift substitutes for the rightful self-expression in collective fashion of any group of men working for any industry, and in order to perpetuate the company-controlled union, things have been done and are being done which, as I said before you came in, Senator Wagner, are leading us, and I think very rapidly, toward an industrial conflict that will be extremely regrettable. To foster the company union, to prevent national unions, things have been done with which you are familiar, and which I need not repeat. One I will mention, that in the coal-mining towns in Pennsylvania, no man, whether he be a minister of the Gospel, a social worker, or an eminent citizen, is allowed to speak in any building, or on any street of that town if he mentions the word "organization."

I will mention one of the towns, if you want me to, Vintondale, where I had the privilege of being driven out by armed thugs of the coal companies. The result, some of us think, is that if conditions continue as they are, to be paradoxical, they are going to get worse than they are, and infinitely worse.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think this measure will tend to prevent the occurrences of labor troubles in the future?

Mr. HOGUE. I do, Senator Walsh. I think short of it, we may prevent them temporarily in spots, but until you have a measure which gives to one side of an industry the established and permitted and recognized legal right to the same self-expression of their rights that the other side has, in its Chambers of Commerce and Associations and other organizations, you are going to have this industrial conflict, and it will increase.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the language of the bill satisfactory to you?

Mr. HOGUE. I think so, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not care to discuss its details?

Mr. HOGUE. I would rather not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are in sympathy with the objective?

Mr. HOGUE. Yes, but let me say just one word in conclusion.

Among the men to speak to our group in England was Sir Alan Smith, who at that time was the president of the British Federation of Industries, who was known as the Judge Gary of Great Britain, and at that time also he had a strike on his hands in his own industry of the engineers, as they call them, the machinists, as we call them here, and in the period of questions and answers after his address one of us asked him what he thought of labor unions, and this comes to the crux of the whole thing.

He said: "What do you mean?"

In other words, he was astounded that such a question should be asked, "What do you think of organized labor on a national scale, a national trade-union movement?"

He said, "No employer in England would do without it. It is our protection as well as their right."

And, until you get the nationally recognized federation of labor in any country, you are going to have all the evils of the competing company unions, the rivalries, the strikes, the spies, the open-shop movement—but when you do once get your recognized and established national federation of labor with its leaders self-elected, and, therefore, responsible, you are going to cure largely the evils inherent in the labor movement itself, and you are going to remove a blot from the industrial civilization of our day.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Hogue.

Mr. Gray?

STATEMENT OF JOHN H. GRAY

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is what, please?

Mr. GRAY. John H. Gray.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. GRAY. 1323 Jackson Street NE., Washington, D.C.

The CHAIRMAN. You are listed as director, American Civil Liberties Union.

Mr. GRAY. That is an error. I am a member, and am here representing that society.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us something about that society.

Mr. GRAY. That society has been organized for a good many years, and has taken a very active and very effective position toward maintaining the civic rights of people who are largely not able to maintain them themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members have you?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know, sir. I am sorry I cannot answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. GRAY. We desire very little of your time. I ask permission to read into the record about one page of a letter. We rest our case entirely on the memorandum submitted to this committee by the International Juridical Association.

Our anxiety is that the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively and to strike in case of necessity shall not be abridged. I will read the letter, if I may, sir. It is addressed to you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Mr. GRAY (reading):

SIR: In considering the bill before you to create the National Labor Board by statute, we desire to voice the view of a considerable number who regard the regulation of labor relations by the Federal Government as dangerous to the rights of labor to organize and strike. Experience under the administration of the N.R.A. and the existing National Labor Board has made that evident.

No such piece of machinery as is proposed, with its various devices for conciliation, can help but impair labor rights in the long run, however much its authors may intend precisely the contrary. The net effect of the N.R.A. on labor relations and the intervention of the National Labor Board in strikes has been to weaken the power of collective bargaining in terms of building bona-fide unions, of enforcing union recognition and of raising the woefully inadequate wages fixed in the codes.

The sole interest of the American Civil Liberties Union in this bill relates to those clauses affecting the rights of labor to organize and strike. That, we submit, is also the primary interest of the organized working classes of this country as a whole. Nothing should be done to curtail such rights, inherent in the proclaimed principles of civil liberty.

The Government has in the last year been so thoroughly committed to a policy of regulating labor relations that we assume it will be written into law in some such form as the bill before you. While we oppose the restrictions on labor's rights inherent in such a set-up, we desire to point out those aspects of the bill which most signally fail to protect the right to organize and strike. Rather than repeat here what will be presented by the International Juridical Association, we desire to say that the analysis of the bill on these points prepared by their attorneys constitutes the most adequate statement of such criticism we have seen. We trust that these criticisms will have the serious attention of your committee.

I submit that to you, sir. It is signed by the officers of the association and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. We appreciate having these views for the record.

Mr. GRAY. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, sir. Mr. Carmody?

STATEMENT OF JOHN M. CARMODY

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. CARMODY. John M. Carmody.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. CARMODY. New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you tell us something of your interest in industrial and labor problems; what your affiliations with those problems have been?

Mr. CARMODY. Yes. Over the years I have been a manager of industrial plants, production manager, and industrial relations manager; a mediator at one time for the National Labor Board.

I have participated in labor negotiations leading up to agreements; have been responsible for the management of a company union, known as the "Rockefeller Union" when I was vice president of the Davis Coal & Coke Co., which had the Rockefeller plant, which was used also in Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your present occupation?

Mr. CARMODY. I am at present with the Civil Works Administration, chief engineer, having charge of labor relations.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have your views respecting this proposed legislation.

Mr. CARMODY. I am interested in this bill particularly because I think we have reached a crisis in our labor relations. My experience as a mediator indicated to me that the people generally have got the impression that when the National Recovery Act was passed, that it gave industry the right to organize, and to arrange its affairs under the codes, to give them rights that they did not previously have, and that, correspondingly, section 7 (a) gave labor the right to organize, and as that right was denied in many places throughout the country, unrest developed.

It strikes me that we have reached the point where we must determine whether the Government has a right and whether Congress has a right to insure people rights that they heretofore have found denied them.

From a practical point of view, it seems perfectly simple to enter into collective bargaining arrangements. It has been done, for instance, for a whole industry since the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act. I refer to the coal industry, with which I am familiar.

The conditions in that industry were commonly known to have been very bad from every conceivable angle. We were exhausting a national resource at great loss to the owners of that resource, and correspondingly, we had bad labor relations, as was commonly known.

Within the past 3 months the industry has begun to make money, peace has settled over the industry in areas that heretofore have not known industrial peace, the operators are not spending as much money for guards and espionage and that sort of thing as they spent before, and by orderly process they have an agreement by which they work out their difficulties and their differences, and conditions are better generally.

I think of that as an industry that heretofore has given a great deal of trouble because men were denied the right to organize.

I suspect the same thing could happen in many other industries. I happen to have been assigned by the National Labor Board to the tool and die strike in Detroit last fall. There was nothing in that situation that could not have been worked out if the manufacturers had felt that section 7 (a) really gave the men the right to collective bargaining, and on an equal basis; in other words, if the same processes had been gone through there to a conclusion that had been gone through in the mining industry, there need not have been this threatened strike at this time.

I had occasion to meet with the gentlemen who are meeting with the President now, the whole group of them, Walter Chrysler, Fisher, Knudson, Roy Chapin, and the rest. This question of whether or not the men had a right to organize came up, the question of whether or not if they made the settlement that I suggested meant the recognition of the union, and I said it did, and our negotiations then broke down at that point because they would not recognize the union.

I said, on the basis of my experience and some acquaintance with the automobile industry, that they would have the situation back in their laps at the height of the busy season, without having heard any such remarks made by anybody concerned with the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything further?

Mr. CARMODY. No; I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any questions, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. You know something about the company unions? Do you know something about the recent organization of the company unions, and the methods pursued?

Mr. CARMODY. Yes; I have seen them being organized as I went about. Let me tell you an experience, if I may, for just a minute.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. CARMODY. I was sent to Buffalo to adjust the strike in the grain industry that had been on for several weeks, and was getting worse. When I went there I met with the grain elevator owners and managers, and I found that the principal elevator owner in that community had organized a company union, had taken the men to a hotel in the evening, and had organized them, and his plant was not on strike; it was the only elevator that was not on strike at the time.

As we went into negotiations, he became chairman for the owners' committee. He was interested in getting the strike settled, and he said to the rest of the men that they must negotiate an agreement inasmuch as their men were organized and on strike. He told me, however, that his men were not out, they were satisfied, and would not go out, and asked me to meet the committee representing his men that night.

I met the committee, and in the course of the discussion one of the men said, "I wonder what Mr. Grammar would say if we suggested to him that we take our company union organization over into the other union as a body. We have better conditions than anybody else in Buffalo, and if the rest of the elevators had as good conditions as we have, we believe the tone of the whole enterprise would be raised."

I said, "I don't know. You have in the agreement which you made the right to withdraw from the contract you signed with him by giving him proper notice."

They asked Mr. Grammar when he came in, and he said they might do that, they had that right.

Mr. Grammar then said he would ask those fellows to canvass the employees, and he would be guided by my judgment as to whether they should go into the union or not.

They made the canvass, they did not report to me, they reported to him, and the next day the company went into the general union in Buffalo. Mr. Grammar himself dictated the agreement in the presence of all the rest of us, and the presence of the union, and the union finally accepted the agreement. He dictated a closed shop agreement because he told me that inasmuch as his men were going in, he did not want any monkey business about it, he wanted a perfectly straight agreement that would protect the industry.

That is a company union that was organized in order to prevent the men going into a local organization, but within 2 days they went over as a body.

Senator WAGNER. He was an enlightened employer?

Mr. CARMODY. I think he was an enlightened employer. He took the leadership of the industry in Buffalo, and he was given credit for taking leadership. They have had no trouble in that industry, so far as I know since that strike was settled last fall.

Now, those of us who have helped organize company unions, and who have worked with them over the years, as I have done in industry, know that they are innocuous, that they are straw men. That is known. There are cases where they are well-managed after 7 or 8 years of careful nursing and watching, but they are straw men. They are set up in order that they may put into——

Senator WAGNER. In other words, so that the employer might control labor?

Mr. CARMODY. Of course. I have helped organize them, and for what other reason would we do it?

Senator WAGNER. That is what I wanted to find out, what other motive would you have except so that you could control them?

Mr. CARMODY. Of course.

Senator WAGNER. That is not genuine industrial democracy?

Mr. CARMODY. Oh, no. It is not so considered.

Senator WAGNER. It does not give the men a fair chance?

Mr. CARMODY. It is not intended to do that.

Senator WAGNER. In spite of all these misrepresentations that have been made in the propaganda that has been organized all over the country—we are so familiar with it here that it does not concern me very much—but an attempt has been made to characterize this bill as providing for the imposition of some definite type of union upon the employer. Do you see any such requirement in the act?

Mr. CARMODY. I do not read that into the bill.

Senator WAGNER. Is there anything here beyond giving the worker the right as a free man, if he wishes to organize, to organize?

Mr. CARMODY. I do not see anything.

Senator WAGNER. And he can join any kind of an organization he cares to?

Mr. CARMODY. I assumed that.

Senator WAGNER. And if he wants to join a company union he can?

Mr. CARMODY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. He can join any kind of an organization, so that all the bill does is to make him as free as the employer?

Mr. CARMODY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. Yet we have this propaganda which has aroused some people——

Mr. CARMODY. As a matter of fact, I have said over the years, to scientific bodies, to engineering bodies, and to personnel associations whom I have been asked to address, that I think one of the worst elements in our American industry is fear, fear on the part of the man that they may not use their own discretion with reference to their associations, because of espionage, as has been mentioned here—I am trying not to go over ground that I know has been gone over many times—it is common practice in many industries to have espionage arrangements. I have personally come into contact with it as a manager. I have had these organizations come to me and ask me to engage them. I have also had friends of mine tip people off around the plant who were being watched, officials to whom reports were coming about people, and their activities, and it gave me an opportunity to tell them. I just have had that experience, and there is no argument about it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. It is fear of dictatorial and what employees believe to be unfair demands on the part of labor leaders that are not under their direct control? Is that not one of the fears that is common?

Mr. CARMODY. Fear on the part of the employer?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CARMODY. Yes; I suspect that is one of the fears on the part of the employer. He lacks the courage that men have acquired, for instance, with the coal industry, when they get on the firing line and negotiate their own agreement without special counsel.

As a matter of fact, when we talk about agitators who would agitate men to organize, we ought to remember that there are many agitators who are making their living by keeping employers blind to some of the newer things that they may accomplish themselves by direct negotiation with their people. I refer to these organizations that supply information that keep manufacturers really from doing the things that they themselves would do, that common sense and good business practices would dictate their doing.

The CHAIRMAN. You made some reference to the Rockefeller plan in your earlier testimony?

Mr. CARMODY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Just what is that?

Mr. CARMODY. That was a company union that was developed largely by McKenzie King and sold to John D. Rockefeller to put into operation in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. plants after the disastrous strike out there some 9 or 10 years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. With what success did it seem to meet?

Mr. CARMODY. For a good many years it operated, but it has since been abandoned. Following the strike of 1927, I believe, when Josephine Roche organized her own arrangements at the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co., the Rockefeller plan broke down that throughout the field, because the men themselves recognized that it gave them fewer rights than they could get through a straight trade-union agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the Rockefeller plan constructed along the line of a company union?

Mr. CARMODY. Oh, yes; it was a company union, with the men having the right to elect pit committeemen; in fact, it went a step farther than most of the company union plans in operation today, in that these men had the right to engage their own commissioner on a salary, and that commissioner represented the men in negotiation with the company.

I was for a period not only vice president in charge of industrial relations, but the company commissioner dealing with the commissioners elected by the men. It was very difficult to keep the company from arranging to have the right commissioner chosen by the men.

Senator WAGNER. Is that mine organized now by outside unions?

Mr. CARMODY. Yes; all of these mines are now under the Appalachian and the District Agreement.

Senator WAGNER. Did that improve conditions?

Mr. CARMODY. I am told that it improved them. I have not been back to those properties, but I have talked to the men in touch with those properties on both sides, operators and men.

Senator WAGNER. This does not prohibit, of course; it leaves the men free, and they may organize a company union so long as it is not dominated by the employer?

Mr. CARMODY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. They may decide to have a union or an organization within the plant only. The only question is that the men themselves should determine it.

Mr. CARMODY. On the whole, I should say that this Rockefeller plan, which really was the result of McKenzie King, came nearer to the ordinary trade-union arrangement than any other company-union plan I know of, but still, when the men, having the right under section 7 (a), and having the backing of a strong union, abandoned it and took another agreement, that is to me one of the best evidences that it had weaknesses from their point of view that we did not recognize.

Senator WAGNER. But so long as that union was not dominated by the employer, it could exist under this form?

Mr. CARMODY. If the men chose to have it.

Senator WAGNER. If the men chose to have it; that is all there is to this.

Mr. CARMODY. That is all; thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Carmody.

(The stenographer will insert in the record the article referred to in the earlier hearings entitled "Problems of Conciliation and Arbitration, A Study in Comparative Law", by E. Kuttig, Research Division, International Labor Office.)

PROBLEMS OF CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION: A STUDY IN COMPARATIVE LAW

(By E. Kuttig, Research Division, International Labor Office)

THE NATURE AND PURPOSE OF CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION

Almost all industrial countries have institutions for the adjustment of industrial disputes; but the nature and the purpose of these institutions are not everywhere viewed alike. One school—to which most of the principal industrial States of continental Europe belong—has worked out a theory of the nature of such adjustment as distinct from the ordinary administration of justice. It regards it as having to do only with those collective labor disputes which may be described as classes of interest, where it is in effect the balance of power between capital and labor that is in question, and in which the object of the parties is to regulate their mutual relations, i.e., in practice, to fix conditions of employment, or, in other words, to create new law in this field. This conception of the adjustment of disputes distinguishes it sharply from the administration of justice, which is the application by the courts of existing law to disputes in which the parties are in conflict as to their respective legal rights. It is almost superfluous to say that disputes concerning legal rights, too, can be settled amicably by agreement between parties without recourse to a judicial decision; and in countries with a special judicial authority for the settlement of individual disputes on points of labor law, efforts in this direction are even strongly encouraged. But here, too the procedure for amicable settlement of such individual disputes is distinct, both in its fundamental idea and in law, from adjustment in the sense just described.

In English-speaking countries, with the exception of Australia and New Zealand,[1] which have developed on distinctive lines, the position is somewhat different. While in these countries there is no doubt some recognition of the distinction between disputes concerning legal rights and clashes of interest, this has by no means always led to the adoption of separate procedure for the two types of dispute. The reason may lie in the nature of English civil procedure, which is not merely the application of existing law to individual cases, in the strict continental sense, but also, and far more than in continental countries, the creation of new law; it has not only an administrative but also a legislative function, in which it resembles adjustment in the sense described above. In Great Britain, for instance, even disputes in which individuals contest each other's legal rights can be brought either before a conciliation or arbitration board set up by agreement between the parties or before a State body (e.g., the Industrial Court) if there is the possibility of fear of a strike or lockout ensuing.

But this difference in the conceptions of the nature of conciliation and arbitration does not alter the fact that in the English-speaking countries, too, the adjustment institutions have in practice to deal chiefly with clashes of interest. It is only in the case of such disputes that the conciliation and arbitration system shows its peculiar characteristics; and it is just in these cases, where the battle is fought out with extraordinary tenacity and bitterness because the vital interests of powerful groups in the community are at stake, that the necessity for a solution leads to action, the initiative in creating the appropriate machinery being taken either by the parties themselves or by the State, which intervenes in order to protect itself, its economic system, and its citizens from the dangers involved in such disputes. In view of the close economic connection between states in the modern world, these clashes of interest, and the open conflict which follows if no agreement is reached, have come to constitute a problem of international importance.

[1] Since completing this article the writer learns that in virtue of an act of Apr. 27, 1932 (Legislative Series, 1932 N.Z. 1) the compulsory adjustment of collective labor disputes in New Zealand has in practice ceased. This does not, however, affect the present discussion, which is not a description of facts but a comparison of legislative principles, and only takes the former New Zealand system as one example of a certain type of adjustment—the compulsory type—of which other examples may be found elsewhere.

As regards the purpose of conciliation and arbitration, this follows from its nature. It is to reconcile the two contending classes of capital and labor, and to combine them into a single productive entity. The adjustment institutions have been happily compared [2] to an industrial first-aid party, ready to intervene wherever a clash of interest endangers the harmonious collaboration of employers and workers in productive activity. These constant clashes are as constantly checked by the institutions, which for the purpose create new legal regulations adapted to the circumstances of each case and thus promote a peaceful settlement. Whatever form conciliation and arbitration procedure may take, it thus amounts to the creation of law on conditions of employment—a task the importance of which can hardly be overestimated.

Considered in closer detail, however, the purpose of conciliation and arbitration is wider in some countries than in others. The variety is confusing; but some order may perhaps be introduced by dividing the national systems into three groups.[3]

The first confines itself to what is the primary aim of all adjustment of disputes—the maintenance of industrial peace. It is composed mainly of the English-speaking countries, excluding Australia and New Zealand. The second is an intermediate group, which aims, beyond the simple maintenance of peace, at the legal recognition and extension of collective labor agreements, and uses conciliation and arbitration to help employers and employed to conclude such agreements whenever they cannot do so without outside aid. This group is not perhaps, so sharply defined, but Austria, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden, as well as France (according to the new bill before the Senate), may be regarded as belonging to it.

The German legislation explicitly states that the purpose of conciliation and arbitration is to assist in the conclusion of collective agreements, and, if this were all, the system of that country could undoubtedly be classed in the same group; but it also gives the conciliators and the Federal Minister of Labor the power to declare decisions—which are normally mere proposals for agreement, to be accepted or rejected as the parties please—legally binding in certain specified circumstances. This is a step further than the second group proper is prepared to go, and makes Germany the connecting link between it and the third group. There provision is ordinarily made for the issue by the conciliation and arbitration authorities of awards binding on the parties, and often for their enforcement by civil or criminal penalties. This is the system of compulsory arbitration, which adds to the typical purpose of the second group—the promotion of collective agreements—another, namely, the regulation of conditions of employment by the State. Besides Germany (in respect of this side of her system), the principal members of this third group are Russia, Italy, Australia, and New Zealand, and, according to recent legislation, Spain and Mexico.

Within this narrower threefold definition of the purpose of conciliation and arbitration, the national systems oscillate between the two rival principles of conciliation and arbitration. In fact, there are numerous transitional stages between the laws which content themselves with mediation between the parties and those which provide for State regulation of conditions of employment. The nature and extent of the acceptance of the principle of arbitration, with its compulsory issue and application of awards, and the exact view taken of the purpose of adjustment, have everywhere a marked influence on the form taken by the whole procedure. The closer a national system is to the principle of arbitration, and the more completely and logically it applies it, the more strictly will the whole procedure be regulated, and the more will that too be subject to compulsion.

It is proposed in the following pages to describe and compare the ways in which the legislation of several States has dealt with certain specially interesting questions concerning the adjustment of disputes. The capacity to be a party to the proceedings, the suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts, the determination of the facts, the legal nature and consequences of decisions, and finally, the conflict between the rival principles of conciliation and arbitration—that is, the problem of compulsion—will be considered in turn.

THE PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDINGS

The definition of the scope of conciliation and arbitration institutions and of the right to use the machinery provided for the adjustment of disputes, that is to say, the question of capacity to be a party to proceedings, is the most important question relating to the parties. The nature of the proceedings themselves and their chances of success depend very largely on the manner in which it is answered.

A glance at the principal systems shows that the practical issue is whether and to what extent individuals or groups of persons, in particular organized groups (such as trade unions, staffs of undertakings, etc.), may be parties to proceedings, whether on the employers' or the workers' side, and that this question has been answered in a wide variety of ways. Certain interesting comparisons are nevertheless possible, and they show that there is a striking correlation (in general, even if not in every detail) between the particular task entrusted to the system for the adjustment of industrial disputes in each country and the answer given to this question of capacity.

It will be found that States which restrict the purpose of their systems primarily to the maintenance of industrial peace allow the machinery to be used not only by trade associations but also by informal groups of persons or by individuals on both sides. In systems where more emphasis is laid on the conclusion of collective agreements and the regulation of conditions of employment by the State, correspondingly greater restrictions are imposed on the persons who may make use of the machinery, until finally, in systems which clearly belong to the third group, only trade associations in a special category, at least on the workers' side, are allowed to use the machinery.

In the systems of the first group, which consists mainly of the English-speaking countries, excluding Australia and New Zealand, and whose sole or principal object is the maintenance of industrial peace, it seems that the problem does not arise. A typical example is the industrial courts act of Great Britain, which definines the trade disputes covered by that act as follows:

"The expression 'trade dispute' means any dispute or difference between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, connected with the employment or nonemployment, or the terms of the employment, or with the conditions of labour or any person."

This definition makes absolutely no distinction between collective and individual disputes. It is therefore easy to understand why no rules or restrictions have been laid down with regard to the parties. The position is the same under the Canadian industrial disputes investigation act of 1907 as amended in 1925; this is shown by the provisions defining industrial disputes, and concerning the representation of workers who are not members of a trade union.

In the systems of the second group, in which the purpose of conciliation and arbitration is primarily the conclusion of collective agreements, a corresponding preference is given to trade associations as parties. Austria, France, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden belong to this group.

The provisions of the Swedish act of May 28, 1920, seem to show that the right to use conciliation and arbitration machinery is not restricted to any definite organized groups of persons or trade associations. The French bill clearly shows that trade associations have not ipso facto rights in this matter; it is only when the dispute concerns an existing collective agreement that the trade unions or groups that have signed the agreement are de jure entitled to use the conciliation machinery. Both France and Sweden have legislation on the subject of collective agreements, and it is probable that—especially in Sweden, where the legislation is quite recent and the importance of collective agreements is great and rapidly increasing, the work of the conciliation and arbitration boards in promoting these agreements will continue to extend, so that in practice the workers' associations will acquire increasing importance as parties to the proceedings. The regulations in the Netherlands under the act of May 4, 1923, may be considered as on a par with those in Sweden. As in that country, there is no definite distinction between collective and individual disputes. If a dispute has caused or threatens to cause a strike or lockout affecting not less than 50 workers, then the conciliation procedure is applicable to it. Since 1927 the Netherlands has had legislation on collective agreements. This will presumably, as in Sweden, lead to an increase in the importance of trade associations on both sides as parties in conciliation proceedings, although by law they have no monopoly.

The new French bill clearly aims at preventing such a development. The Austrian system may also be mentioned in this connection. The preamble to the conciliation boards act of December 18, 1919, indicates clearly that no sharp distinction was intended to be made between the treatment of individual and collective disputes. Here, too, therefore, the right of the workers to use the conciliation and arbitration machinery is not restricted to organized groups. In view of the extent to which collective agreements have been adopted in Austria the part played by the trade associations, at least on the workers' side, in the conciliation and arbitration procedure is in practice of decisive importance.

The German regulations on the subject state explicitly that the task of the conciliation and arbitration authorities is to promote the conclusion of collective agreements. They may not undertake other tasks. It follows that the parties allowed to use the adjustment machinery must be identical with the parties who have the right to conclude collective arrangements, which in German law include agreements for a whole trade (collective agreements in the strict sense) and works agreements for a single undertaking. Consequently on the workers' side only certain specified groups—the trade unions in the case of collective agreements for a whole trade and the staff of an undertaking in the case of works agreements—can be parties to the adjustment procedure.

The German system is the link connecting the second with the third group, in which the right to issue binding awards, which are subject to criminal penalties for nonobservance, means the intervention of the State in the fixing of wages and other conditions of employment. In Germany this function developed out of the adjustment authorities' primary duty of promoting collective agreements, through the provision of the law which makes it possible, in certain definitely specified and exceptional cases, to declare awards binding on the parties.

In systems of the third group, however, this has become the explicit and essential function of the conciliation and arbitration machinery. This group includes the systems of Russia, Italy, and especially Australia and New Zealand. In the last two countries the regulation of conditions of employment is naturally linked with the fixing of minimum wages, which in most cases has been the starting point of the conciliation and arbitration system. This last conception of the purpose of the machinery clearly affects the question of the parties that may make use of it.

According to the New Zealand legislation, an industrial dispute means "any dispute arising between one or more employers of industrial unions or associations of employers and one or more industrial unions or associations of workers in relation to industrial matters." Consequently, the party to a dispute referred to a council of conciliation or a court of arbitration must logically be, on the workers' side, an industrial union, which in addition must be registered. The situation is similar in New South Wales, where apparently only registered trade unions may be parties to the proceedings. Such a rule is not so strictly enforced in the other Australian States, but the principle is everywhere the same.

A perfect example of the correlation between the tasks of the conciliation and arbitration system and the determination of the parties to the proceedings is offered by the Italian system of jurisdiction in labor matters (magistratura del lavoro), according to the act of April 3, 1926, concerning the legal regulation of collective relations and the administrative regulations of July 1, 1926. The Italian system, though in the last resort it takes the form of judicial proceedings before the labor court, fulfills all the three tasks of maintaining industrial peace, promoting collective agreements, and regulating conditions of employment. We find as a consequence that even on the employers' side only recognized associations may take part in the proceedings.

In Russia, on the workers' side, only the trade unions may appear before the conciliation board or arbitration court in the case of collective disputes. In Russian law there are no associations of employers, so that on the employers' side an individual employer has the right to be a party to the proceedings. It must, of course, be remembered that in practice, in most of the more important cases, the trade unions will be opposed by a State undertaking or an association of such undertakings. There can be no doubt that such an association has the right to be a party to conciliation or arbitration proceedings.

What, then, is the real reason for this correlation between the tasks of the various systems and the question who may be a party to the proceedings? The more the task of conciliation and arbitration machinery is extended from the simple maintenance of industrial peace to the conclusion of collective agreements, and thence to the official regulation of conditions of employment, the more necessary does it become to have as parties to the proceedings responsible organizations which can apply the agreements arrived at or the authoritative awards issued.

This necessarily becomes particularly clear when the decisions of the conciliation and arbitration authorities are enforced not only by civil but also by criminal penalties, as in Italy and in most of the Australian States. In such a case the legislator has to make sure that, at least on the workers' side he is dealing with organized groups which can be held liable for the nonobservance of the decision and for the outbreak of any illegal strikes. This is why the Italian act mentioned above states that recognized associations of workers shall have legal personality; for the same reason many of the Australian States and New Zealand provide that industrial unions must be registered before they can take part in conciliation and arbitration proceedings.

THE SUSPENSIVE PROHIBITION OF STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS

A particularly effective means of insuring that the adjustment procedure shall be properly set in motion and carried out has been adopted in a number of countries, including some which do not otherwise apply compulsion; open conflict (a lockout or a strike) is explicitly forbidden, or at least desclared to be illegal, until all the possibilities of conciliation and arbitration have been exhausted. Such an important limitation of the freedom of action of trade organizations cannot but have an effect on the procedure, an effect which is usually expressed in an obligation, either explicit or implicit in the law, to give notice of differences or to apply for a settlement.

The best known regulations on the subject are those of the Canadian act of June 12, 1925 (amending the original act of 1907), which provides for a suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts and also of changes in conditions of employment, and makes it obligatory to give at least 30 days' notice of any proposed change and to apply for the appointment of a board of conciliation and investigation. These regulations are enforced by heavy fines for any infringement of the prohibition of open conflict (up to $1,000 per day for employers and up to $50 for workers).

Similar regulations are contained in the legislation of Belgium, China, India, New South Wales, New Zealand, Norway, Queensland, Rumania, South Africa, and western Australia, and of Germany in virtue of an emergency order issued by the President on November 10, 1920, and in force together with the actual conciliation order. The regulations vary greatly in respect of the disputes to which they apply, the period during which open conflict is prohibited, and the civil, criminal, and other consequences of contraventions.

In Belgium, China, Norway, New South Wales, Queensland, and western Australia, the suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts applies to all undertakings, irrespective of their nature and size. In Rumania the prohibition applies only to undertakings that regularly employ at least 10 workers, in Canada to important undertakings with at least 10 workers, notably in the transport industry, and in India and South Africa principally to public-utility undertakings. In New Zealand there is a general prohibition, and in addition notice must be given of intended strikes or lockouts in public-utility undertakings. The order of November 10, 1920, issued by the German President, applies only to undertakings that supply the public with gas, water, and electricity.

The period during which open conflict is prohibited varies. According to the acts already mentioned of Belgium, Canada, China, Queensland, Rumania, South Africa, and Western Australia among others, strikes and lockouts are prohibited during the whole period before and during the conciliation and arbitration proceedings and until it is recognized that the possibilities of settlement are exhausted. In Germany, according to the President's emergency order, they are even prohibited for 3 days after the publication of the decision of the competent adjustment authority. The Belgian regulations do not explicitly prohibit strikes and lockouts, but merely attach legal consequences to them when premature; in effect, they support the opponents of the party declaring the strike or lockout. It is to be noted that the German emergency order just mentioned provides penalties, not for an illegal strike as such, but only for incitement thereto, while in the case of a lockout the action as well as the incitement is punishable.

A number of countries do not prohibit open conflict for the whole period of the negotiations, but provide only for the observance of certain time limits before which a lockout or strike cannot be legally declared. Instances are India, New Zealand, and New South Wales; in the last-named State this time limit applies to strikes only, lockouts being completely prohibited. The object of imposing such a time limit—usually from a fortnight to a month—before a strike or lockout is permissible to naturally give the competent authorities an opportunity to intervene and to settle the dispute by friendly means.

In the majority of cases contraventions of the prohibition of open conflict render the guilty party liable to criminal penalties; frequently, however, the prohibition is enforced by proceedings under civil law or labor law. Criminal, civil, and other consequences may also exist side by side. Where penalties are provided, they take the form of fines or imprisonment or both.

Penalties under criminal law are provided for contraventions of the suspensive prohibition of open conflict in the legislation of Canada, India, New South Wales, New Zealand, Norway, Rumania, South Africa, and Western Australia, and also in States with a general prohibition of strikes and lockouts, such as Italy and South Australia. Some of these countries prescribe fines only, while in others imprisonment also is provided for. The penalties vary greatly in the different regulations; the comparatively high fines in the Canadian system have already been mentioned. When imprisonment is permitted it is often used only to punish illegal strikes and lockouts in public utility undertakings, or it may be particularly severe in these cases, as in Rumania and Italy. The imprisonment specified in the different systems varies from a month to 2 years, or even in particularly aggravating circumstances (in Italy, disputes in public utility undertakings in which one or more persons are killed), to 3 years.

The consequences in civil and labor law which the legislation of many countries attaches to contravention of the suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts also deserve mention. Under the German Civil Code, for instance, persons guilty of contraventions of the emergency order of November 10, 1920, are liable for damages. It may be assumed that in other countries, too, a party to the dispute who is injured by the contravention of the prohibition, or a third party who is injured by it without being concerned in the dispute, can claim damages according to general legal principles. When there is civil liability for contravention of the suspensive prohibition of strikes, and lockouts, its legal basis lies outside the special regulations for conciliation and arbitration; but these regulations themselves sometimes provide for measures based on labor laws to enforce the prohibition. Belgium and New Zealand are a noteworthy examples.

In New Zealand the measures relate to the right of association, on which they impose appreciable restrictions. They affect workers' organizations only, and may, though they need not, be applied in addition to the imposition of a fine. The most important is that the court inflicting the fine may order that the registration of the convicted union or association shall be suspended for such period as it thinks fit, not exceeding 2 years. This suspension has very important consequences. During the period of suspension, the union or association is "incapable of instituting or continuing or being a party to any conciliation or arbitration proceedings under this act, or of entering into any industrial agreement, or of taking or continuing any proceedings for the enforcement of an award or industrial agreement, or of making any application for the cancellation of its registration."

The Belgian act does not explicitly prohibit strikes and lockouts, but tries to induce the parties to have recourse to the procedure for conciliation and arbitration by supporting the opponents of the party which declares a strike or lockout before exhausting all possibilities of settlement. In the case of premature lockouts and of strikes due to the premature change of conditions of employment by the employers, the way this is effected is that the workers concerned are treated as involuntarily unemployed and are granted unemployed benefit, which places them in a better position to carry on the struggle forced on them by the employer. In the converse case, the workers (or the association to which they belong) who prematurely go on strike or alter conditions of employment lose their right to support from their unemployment society and the national emergency fund.

The suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts, combined with the related obligation to give notice of proposed action and to apply to an adjustment institution, is the first important measure of compulsion in the procedure. It is of great significance for the parties since it limits their freedom to engage in militant action at the moment they consider most favorable, and thus perhaps makes such action impossible. But the consideration on which it is based, namely, that for economic and psychological reasons a settlement after the outbreak of open conflict is usually much more difficult than before, should certainly be given due weight. In Canada the prohibition seems to have had satisfactory results, perhaps partly owing to the provisions for preventing its abuse, especially in the form of deliberate delay of the proceedings. As a matter of fact, the prohibition applies chiefly to strikes and lockouts, in public utility undertakings, which in practice are likely to be of most importance in this connection.

In any case such temporary prohibition is to be sharply distinguished in principle from a general prohibition of all strikes and lockouts combined with compulsory enforcement of the awards of the conciliation and arbitration institutions. The former merely serves to insure that the institutions shall be utilized by the parties to the dispute before they begin open hostilities, while the latter deprives them completely of their freedom to engage in militant action and leads as a rule to State regulation of all conditions of employment. While in most countries the legislature has recoiled from these far-reaching consequences, it has often thought it useful to insure that the parties shall exhaust the possibilities of settlement through the institutions created for the purpose of maintaining industrial peace before they are permitted to take the law into their own hands. It is therefore comprehensible that in the many countries in which a reform of the conciliation and arbitration system is now under consideration, the question of the suspensive prohibition of open conflict, as described above, is being given considerable attention. During the discussions now in course in Germany, for instance, on the reform of the adjustment system, ideas of this kind are being defended, notably by employers and also by many economists. The suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts is described as the "basic safeguard of peaceful negotation", and the most energetic means—e.g., the payment of heavy deposits as security, support of the opponents of the recalcitrant party, and statutory prolongation of the conditions fixed by the existing agreement between the parties—are often advocated for its enforcement.[4]

THE DETERMINATION OF THE FACTS

The direct object of adjustment proceedings is to ascertain the facts of the case. In this they resemble legal proceedings proper. But there is a difference in the use to which the knowledge of the facts is to be put in the two cases, corresponding to the difference in nature between the administration of justice and the adjustment of clashes of interest. For the former such knowledge is needed to enable the judge to make his decision in application of the law; for the latter it is needed to enable the conciliation or arbitration authorities to discover and decide on a settlement of the dispute that will be voluntarily adopted by the parties or can reasonably be imposed on them. In the first case, therefore, the determination of the facts is the basis for a declaration of the legal position by a judge; in the second it is the basis for the creation of new law, whether in the form of an agreement between the parties or of a solution imposed by the court or board on its own authority or directly by the State.

The facts may be determined in two ways: By hearing the usually contradictory statements of the parties; or by the evidence of witnesses and experts, the examination of books, personal inspection at the scene of the dispute, and other investigations, e.g., into the economic position of the industry concerned in the dispute.

The statements of the parties are not, as in civil cases, used by them to stake out their legal position but to obtain an estimate of the opponent's strength and so of the likelihood that it will maintain or reduce its claims. The function of the mediating institution is to find in the expositions of the parties a basis for compromise which both may accept and to overcome psychological obstacles to their agreement. At this stage of the negotiations, when the institution has a purely psychological function in the search for a compromise the oral exposition of the parties is often quite sufficient to determine the facts of the case. It may then be needless, for instance, for the mediator to know what the industry in question is actually capable of; it is enough for the exercise of his functions, which are purely psychological, to hear the statements and explanations of the parties on the subject.

The position changes as soon as the mediating institutions are no longer limited to psychological assistance and persuasion, but begin to exert, according to the methods of the particular system in question, some form of pressure on the parties in the direction of a particular settlement. As this pressure increases so also does the part played by the conciliation or arbitration authority in the eventual settlement, and with it that authority's responsibility. If it is to carry this responsibility, it must have corresponding means of supplementing what it can learn of the psychological position from the statements of the parties by further objective inquiry into the facts of the situation. The transition from the former to the latter position often takes place unnoticed; it becomes evident when the mediating insititution collects official information on the industrial position and the labor market, and tries to use this information to influence the parties.

The transition is obvious when a court or board is explicitly given the function of investigating conditions in the industry, in order to influence the parties toward agreement on a given basis by publishing the information it obtains. Finally, there is a complete reversal of the situation in the case of systems which, if voluntary negotiations fail, provide for compulsory settlement if by the competent authority, which must, therefore, be allowed wide powers for the determination of the facts—by the interrogation of witnesses, the taking of statements on the spot, etc. In this important matter, too, therefore, the correlation between the exact aim of conciliation and arbitration and the form and nature of the procedure is apparent.

If the manifold provisions of national conciliation and arbitration legislation, dealing with the determination of the facts are passed in review, the impression gained is that the legislatures have groped their way step by step without always finding a satisfactory or final solution. The difficulties begin as soon as the system allows measures of compulsion for this purpose and vary with the degree of compulsion. The legislator must decide how far he may go in the way of the compulsory investigation of the economic or technical secrets of an undertaking, without running counter to the principle of the freedom of private enterprise—a principle still very generally accepted, despite the modern development of the capitalist system and the many limitations and obligations it has brought with it. It is in principle the same problem as is raised in its most pronounced form by the compulsory application of awards in collective disputes which will be discussed more fully in the last section of this article.

The various regulations concerning the determination of the facts may be conveniently divided into four groups.

The first group includes the regulations in which the proceedings depend solely on the parties, will to agree, while the mediating institution limits itself essentially to overcoming the psychological obstacles to agreement, without intervening in an authoritative way itself. The systems in Great Britain (the Industrial Courts Act)—except the inquiry procedure, which will be mentioned later—Denmark, Finland, Sweden, and also Germany belong to this group. In all these countries the hearing of the parties is the principal method of determining the facts, other methods being sometimes not even mentioned. When mentioned, they are obviously regarded as of less importance, and in any case depend on the acquiescence of the parties.

It should be emphasized that the German act avoids any compulsion with regard to the determination of the facts, although, as is well known, it provides in certain conditions for a declaration that the award imposed on the parties is binding in civil law. It differs in this respect, as will be seen from the subsequent discussion of the fourth group, from the other systems that recognize the compulsory application of awards, though in most of these compulsion is carried further and has criminal penalties attached to it; clearly it may thus be grouped with the systems that wish to maintain the principle of voluntary agreement between the parties and base their rules for the determination of the facts on this principle. Here, too, the determination of the facts remains dependent on the voluntary cooperation of the parties.

The second group includes the systems that do not recognize compulsion in the execution of awards, but consider it advisable to give the adjustment bodies wider powers with regard to the determination of the facts. The principal systems belonging to this group are those of the Netherlands and Norway, and also Switzerland under the appropriate provisions of the Federal Factory Act. In these countries the parties, witnesses, and experts are liable to fines and other penalties for failure to attend, take part in the proceedings, and to give evidence; in Norway they are further bound, on pain of a fine, to submit original documents, and the conciliator is empowered to investigate at the scene of the dispute and to acquire information in other ways. In the arbitration proceedings of the Netherlands, which can, however, only be instituted with the consent of the parties, persons who fail to give the information demanded of them are liable to imprisonment up to 6 months. Not only witnesses and experts, but also the parties to the dispute may be interrogated under oath. These severe regulations may be explained by the fact that arbitration is intended to be used in disputes which closely affect the interests of the community and are therefore no longer a purely private issue.

Besides proceedings before the State conciliator alone, before the conciliation council, and before the arbitration court, the Netherlands act also provides for separate investigation proceedings. It thus forms the transition stage from the second to the third group, including systems that provide a special procedure for the determination of the facts.

Statutory investigation proceedings are a characteristic part of the systems of English-speaking countries, and in particular of Canada and Great Britain. In these countries complete dependence on the parties' will to agree must at times cause dissatisfaction, particularly in important disputes which closely affect the public interest. In English-speaking countries great weight is attached to public opinion, and so it was regarded as desirable to bring its influence to bear on the settlement of disputes. For this purpose the public has to be provided with material enabling it to form an opinion. This is effected by the publication of a report by the competent authority (conciliation board or court of inquiry) on the causes of the dispute and the technical and economic possibilities of some particular settlement. The report naturally cannot be drawn up without an impartial investigation of the facts. This scheme enables the principle of voluntary negotiation to be maintained, while at the same time allowing public opinion to exert an effective pressure to the general advantage.

The success of such methods of investigation depends on and therefore justifies certain measures of compulsion for the determination of the facts. Such measures are in fact permitted by the British industrial courts act, and the Canadian industrial disputes investigation act. In the British act, the competent minister may make rules regulating the procedure of any court of inquiry, including rules as to the summoning of witnesses, the administration of the oath, and the submission of documentary evidence. The Canadian act clearly specifies the possibility of compulsion.

Even without special investiture by the Minister, a board of conciliation and investigation has all the powers of a court of record in civil cases—that is, it has "the powers of summoning before it, and enforcing the attendance of witnesses, of administering oaths, and of requiring witnesses to give evidence on oath or on solemn affirmation * * * and to produce such books, papers, or other documents or things as the board deems requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which it is inquiring." It has also far-reaching rights with regard to investigation at the scene of the dispute. Noncompliance may be punished by a fine of up to $100. It is important to note that here, as in the arbitration procedure under the Netherlands act, either party is competent to give evidence and may be compelled to do so. In proceedings that so closely concern the public interest this is only logical.

The investigation procedure appears to have rendered good service on many occasions, especially in Canada, and will perhaps play a part in the future development of conciliation and arbitration. It is worthy of note that investigation proceedings also take place in many countries where the law does not specifically provide for them. In Germany, to give one example only, committees of experts have repeatedly been set up in recent years, usually on the basis of an agreement between the parties; they have dealt with such particularly complicated matters as the economic position of the Rhine shipping industry and the transition from the 2-shift to the 3-shift system in lignite mines.

The fourth and last group includes the systems which, because they allow compulsory application of the awards of the adjustment bodies and their enforcement by criminal or civil remedies, are logically bound to provide a corresponding degree of compulsion for the determination of the facts. The responsibility for decisions in such systems is very grave, and there is a correspondingly grave need for the awards to be based on an impartial and expert determination of the facts. When the State intervenes in the regulation of conditions of employment it is in a sense creating law; and these "laws" fixing binding conditions of employment for the parties, cannot be correctly drafted and administered unless the conditions in question have been fully and impartially determined. The provisions of this kind in most of the Australian States, New Zealand, and Italy indubitably arose out of considerations of this sort. The right to take evidence by compulsion and to put witnesses on oath, far-reaching powers with regard to investigation at the scene of the dispute, and the obligation to submit books, accounts, and other documents are found repeatedly, with minor variations in details. The usual penalties for noncompliance with the regulations on the determination of the facts are a fine of up to 20 pounds (or even 50 pounds) and imprisonment up to 1 month.

THE LEGAL NATURE AND CONSEQUENCES OF DECISIONS

Important as may be the questions already discussed—the capacity to be a party to the proceedings, the suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts, and the determination of the facts—it is the legal nature, depending in its turn on the legal consequences, of the decisions issued that is the final test of the character of an adjustment system. The legal consequences are of two sorts; they are, first, quantitative, that is to say, they extend over a certain number of persons concerned in the dispute; and secondly, qualitative, that is, they entail, for these persons, various kinds of more or less binding obligations. There is a close correlation between the two sorts of legal consequences; if the quantitative consequences (that is the scope of the decision) increase or decrease, there is a corresponding change in the qualitative consequences (i.e. the extent of the obligations imposed on the parties).

Adjustment systems may be divided into two main groups according to the qualitative and quantitative consequences of their decisions. The first group contains the systems based primarily on the principle of conciliation. In them the scope of decisions is limited to the actual parties to the dispute. The parties' acceptance of a conciliation proposal, which in these systems is never binding, or their agreement in advance to accept an arbitration award, which only thus becomes binding, entails obligations in fact or in law for them alone. In the systems of the second group, on the other hand, the ruling principle is that of arbitration, or the regulation by the authorities of the relations between the parties. With this qualitative extension, the scope of the decisions is also widened quantitatively; either during the proceedings or by a subsequent special decision it is or may be extended to persons not originally parties to the dispute.

The first group of systems contains the English-speaking countries (except Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa), Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden. In all of these, the result of the proceedings depends solely on the parties' will to agree. The proposals of the adjustment authority—they can hardly be called decisions in the legal sense—are not binding, and only have consequences after the acceptance by the parties. Even these, in the English speaking countries, are as a rule consequences in fact only, no legal obligation but only the moral obligation of a "gentlemen's agreement" being created. In the other countries mentioned insofar as collective labor agreements are regulation by law, such an agreement, with the legal rights and duties it involves, comes into being; in other cases the result is at least certain obligations under the general law of contracts. According to the legislation of the States in this first group, therefore, the answer to the question what is the legal nature of the "decisions" of the adjustment institutions is that they are administrative acts of a public authority, whose binding effects in fact or in law depend on the free choice of the parties. The obligation incurred by acceptance or acquiescence is in principle an obligation under the civil law only.

The German regulations illustrate the transition stage between the systems of the first group and those of the second. There, the award of an adjustment authority is a proposal not binding on the parties, who can accept or reject it as they find good. If they accept it, a collective agreement comes into existence between them with rights and duties on either side; but these have only civil validity and affect no one but the actual parties.

Rejection entails no obligation whatever. To this extent the German system may be included in the first group, in which the quantitative and qualitative scope of the decisions issued is narrow; but further provisions seem to place it also in the second group, which contains the systems with decisions of wider scope in both respects. This classification is imposed by the provision that the award—that is, the adjustment authority's conciliation proposal—"may be declared binding if the settlement contained therein appears just and reasonable, with due consideration for the interests of both parties, and if its application is necessary for economic and social reasons."

The possibility of declaring awards binding is a break with the principle of voluntary agreement as typified in the regulations of the first group. By such a declaration a collective agreement between the parties is compulsorily created by State intervention—a qualitative legal consequence which in systems of the first group could only be the result of a voluntary decision of the parties. Such a compulsory collective agreement in itself binds only the parties to the proceedings, and thus has the same limited quantitative scope as proposals or awards accepted by the parties. This scope may, however, in certain circumstances be extended by a declaration that an award is generally binding, given by the Federal Minister of Labor, on the application of at least one of the parties to the collective agreement, which may also be a "compulsory collective agreement," of the kind just mentioned.

The following appears therefore to be the legal nature of conciliation proposals and arbitration awards in Germany. First of all they are, like those of the first group, administrative acts of a public authority, whose binding effect depends in principle on a voluntary decision of the parties directly concerned. By means of a further act on the part of the authorities, the award may be declared binding and so transformed into a collective agreement, which is within the sphere of private law. Finally, a third administrative act may declare this compulsory collective agreement generally binding and so extend its quantitative scope. It may thus fairly be concluded that the legal consequences of decisions of the German institutions, though influenced by public law, belong in essence to the domain of private law.

In the systems belonging to the second group, the domain of private law is definitely left behind and public law takes its place. The systems of the Australian States, New Zealand, and Italy are the principal members of this group.

This statement may be justified by an analysis of the qualitative consequences of the decisions. According to the Australian and New Zealand acts,the awards of the arbitration courts—the final courts of appeal in conciliation and arbitration—are binding on the parties and are consistently enforced by criminal penalties of very varied kinds. A distinction may be drawn between direct and indirect methods of enforcement.

The principal direct method to be mentioned is the power of some arbitration courts to fix penalties for breach of an award varying between 10 pounds and 500 pounds, as the guilty party is an organization or an employer or worker belonging to an organization. Regulations empowering the competent authority to issue orders or injunctions to compel compliance with awards under pain of fine and imprisonment also come under this head.

An important and frequent indirect method of enforcing awards in the general prohibition of lockouts and strikes in connection with industrial disputes. Not only lockouts and strikes as such but also anything "in the nature of a lockout or strike", such as incitement, instigation, or aid, fall under this prohibition. Contravention is usually punishable by penalties similar to those prescribed for breach of an award; an organization may also incur special sanctions, such as suspension for a certain period of its registration as a union, so that it becomes incapable of being a party to any conciliation or arbitration proceedings and of concluding any collective agreement, and loss by its members, of the rights arising out of any award or collective agreement (e.g., in New Zealand). Other indirect methods of enforcing awards include provisions intended to protect a worker from dismissal by his employer because he is entitled to the benefits of an award, or protecting the employer against the discontinuance of work by any worker for a like reason, either offense being punishable by a fine. Finally, it should be mentioned that under several acts special inspectors may be appointed to enforce awards.

The above examples taken from Australian and New Zealand legislation illustrate the far-reaching qualitative effects of awards—the obligation imposed on the parties by means of penalties for nonobservance. The quantative effects—the actual or potential scope of the award as to persons and area—are correspondingly wide. Under the German regulations the declaration that an award is generally binding can take place only on the conclusion of the proceedings and at the request of the persons concerned; but in Australia and New Zealand the courts may in many cases extend the group of persons party to the proceedings as they think fit.

More important still, by the declaration that it is generally binding (the "common rule"), the award can be extended, at or after the conclusion of the proceedings, to persons other than the actual parties. There are provisions of this sort in the Commonwealth, South Australian, Queensland, and New Zealand acts; the Commonwealth act, is characteristic of the lengths to which such extension may go, for, according to it, the award is binding on "all parties to the industrial dispute who appear * * * before the court; all parties who have been summoned or notified to appear as parties to the dispute, or required to answer the claim * * *; in the case of employers, any successor, or any assignee or transmittee of the business of a party to the dispute or of a party bound by the award * * *; in the case of employers, any successor, or any assignees or transmittee of the business of a party to the dispute or of a party bound by the award * * *; all organizations and persons on whom the award is at any time declared by the court to be binding as a common rule; and all members of organizations bound by the award."

All these instances of the qualitative and quantitative effects of awards under the legislation of Austrialia and New Zealand, which can be only briefly sketched here, show plainly the legal nature of awards in this group of systems. The domain of private law has been abandoned, and they have the full force of public law. Further, the Australian Commonwealth act and the New Zealand act, in a very remarkable provision, go so far as to rule that in certain cases an award actually overrides an act.

Finally, some reference is needed to the important question on the practicability of criminal proceedings for the enforcement of awards. Only Australia and New Zealand have a fairly long experience on this subject. So far as reliable data are available, these justify the assumption that criminal proceedings are hardly practicable if large numbers of persons are determined not to respect the law; this has occurred several times in Australia. The efficiency of this, like any other, legislation depends in the last resort on whether it has the approval and active support of public opinion. In countries where the decisions of the conciliation and arbitration institutions involve only a civil liability, the matter is much simpler. In Germany, for instance, in the very large majority of cases, compulsory agreements arising out of a declaration that an award is binding have in fact been executed. But here, too, there are undoubtedly limits to the possibilities of enforcement. If such a declaration were too crassly at variance with the balance of power between the parties or with economic and social arguments, the injured party would probably take the risk of breaking the agreement so imposed on it.

THE RIVAL PRINCIPLES OF CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION

The above comparative study of the nature and purpose of conciliation and arbitration, the capacity to be a party to the proceedings, the suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts, the determination of the facts, and the legal nature and consequences of decisions makes it clear that an essential question is whether in a given system, the principle of conciliation or that of arbitration, free will or compulsion, has the upper hand.

This is the pith of the problem, the point around which argument centers. There is no doubt, as we have seen above, numerous transition stages between systems based solely on the principle of voluntary agreement and those recognizing compulsory arbitration; these are represented by systems in which the State does not impose the final settlement, but which nevertheless provide for various sorts of compulsion during the proceedings—compulsory application to the institution, during the proceedings—suspensive prohibition of strikes and lockouts, obligation to give evidence and information, and so forth. But the question only arises in its most striking form and in the case of systems which provide for the compulsory regulation of actual conditions of employment by way of binding decisions in the conciliation and arbitration authorities. These are no mere details of procedure, but important excursions into positive law; like voluntary agreements, they create new law to regulate the relations between the parties. The question is so important that a further discussion of the principles involved is advisable to show why the conflict of opinion is so strong.

The antithesis between voluntary conciliation and compulsory arbitration is at bottom the application to a limited sphere, the regulation of conditions of employment, of the wider anthithesis between the system of unshackled private enterprise, and a planned economy under State influence. It is easy to understand that employers, guided by the ruling ideas of individualism and free competition, should usually be opposed in principle to compulsory arbitration, and regard the determination of conditions of employment, and in particular of wages, by the State as a dangerous and intolerable interference with the free play of economic forces.

They may perhaps not object to restrictions which are imposed on the freedom of industry by its own action (through agreements between economic or trade organizations, etc.), and which do actually exist to a very wide extent in certain domains (e. g., for prices); but they denounce the intervention of the State in the fixing of working conditions as being guided not by economic but by political motives which have often nothing to do with the point at issue; and declare that in the long run more harm than good will result from it.

The supporters of State intervention reply that the adjustment of disputes by the State is on the whole to be regarded and organized, not as a judicial, but, from the nature of the subject, as an administrative function of the State, which cannot be performed without exposure to political influence; that as a matter of course the State acts on political grounds in other spheres of administration—economic policy, fiscal policy for the public services (railways, gas, water, electricity), taxation policy, and in particular social policy; and that to do so in the case of wages is therefore at least not illogical. The supporters of compulsion may deprecate abuses in "political wage fixing," but they hold the view that to distinguish between admissible and inadmissible political influence in individual cases is very difficult, and that unavoidable mistakes are not a decisive argument. In their opinion important industrial disputes in the modern State have become political matters and can be decided only in accordance with the general policy of the Government, which must be a consistent whole if it is to be successful.

Disputes in public utility undertakings (hospitals, railways, gas, water, electricity, etc.), are often separately dealt with. It must be recognized that the public is particularly concerned in such cases, and that the authoritative intervention of the State can be justified for reasons such as the maintenance of public order, the supply of the necessities of life, etc., which are seldom in question in other industrial disputes. Differences of opinion on the admissibility and value of State intervention in such cases are much less common and employers who are otherwise definitely opposed to it admit its necessity here under certain conditions.

It is idle to ask which, in the abstract, is the ideal principle—voluntary or compulsory settlement, conciliation or arbitration. The question is reasonable only in relation to the legal and economic conditions of a given country, and the answer must be that the system which is most in harmony with those conditions will reach the highest degree of efficiency. Earlier in this article the various national systems were classified according to the purpose they attach to conciliation and arbitration—the maintenance of industrial peace, the promotion of collective agreements, or the regulation of conditions of employment by the State; this classification shows that practically all the more important States have systems in keeping with their legal and economic organization.

Great Britain and most of the other English-speaking States (Australia and New Zealand always excepted) have economic and legal systems based on the principles of individualism and economic liberalism; their adjustment systems are in keeping, having the sole duty of maintaining industrial peace by assisting the parties to reach a voluntary settlement. It is significant that these States have no legislation on collective labor agreements.

Most of the States of greater industrial importance on the Continent of Europe, such as Austria, France, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, etc., have incorporated in their legal systems originally built upon the individualistic principle, certain elements of collective law, notably, and of most interest in the present connection, on the subject of collective labor agreements; they have thus assumed the second type of function, the promotion of collective agreements, though this is usually implicit, rather than explicit. It is true that there is no direct regulation of conditions of employment by the State, but the agreements reached in the adjustment procedure, when transformed into collective agreements, engender some form of legal obligation.

That in Germany the promotion of collective agreements is a specific duty of the adjustment institutions is quite in accordance with the general development of German law since 1918, of which the highly developed collective labor law is an important manifestation. But the German system has gone a step further. During the troubles which followed the war the State intervened—often merely following up analogous intervention during the war—to regulate and decide matters in various important economic fields (coal, electricity, the cartel system, etc.) and in general, too, in all activity of the public authorities in the domain of private enterprise. Corresponding to this economic activity of the State, and in particular to its influence on prices and on interest, which is once more plainly visible in the emergency order of December 8, 1931, there was naturally also State influence on wage determination. By declaring awards binding, the arbitration institutions assume the third function of adjustment—the regulation of conditions of employment by the State.

But the law confines these declarations to certain specified exceptional cases which affect the public interest; and they entail civil consequences only. The law in fact still holds to the principle of freedom of contract for the parties to collective labor agreements.

It is obvious, lastly, that this third function—the regulation of conditions of employment by the State—which is assigned to the adjustment systems in Italy and Russia, is a logical consequence of the whole legal and economic systems of these two States. Moreover, it is perhaps significant that in countries like Australia and New Zealand, where the accepted legal and economic principles have essentially an individualistic basis, the compulsory arbitration systems in force have been severely criticized and are constantly being altered.

Undoubtedly, however, there is often sharp criticism even where the adjustment system is apparently in harmony with the legal and economic organization of the country. Apart from attacks on the working of the system in individual cases, this may probably be explained by the changes that are now in process in industry, and in society, which may entail profound changes in the legal systems of the States. Individualistic and collectivist forms of economic and legal organization are competing for supremacy, and the contest between the two forms of adjustment of disputes is a part of this greater struggle. The outcome is uncertain and the attempt to foresee it will serve no useful purpose here.

But, whatever the ultimate result of that contest, the general object of all conciliation and arbitration is the same; it is to guide employers and workers, in their own interests and in that of society—toward peaceful methods in the struggle for the division of the product of labor, a struggle which is a manifestation of the life instinct in man and therefore inevitable; to show them that they need one another, however, natural the antagonism between them, and that they must meet n some form of productive collaboration unless they are both to perish. The adjustment of industrial disputes has thus, in its smaller sphere, the same object as the institutions and efforts for the creation of a community of nations and the amicable settlement of the inevitable disputes arising out of conflicting interests in the political world.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand adjourned until 2:30 this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at the hour of 12:20 p.m., the further hearing was recessed until 2:30 p.m. of this date, Thursday, Mar. 22, 1934.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The CHAIRMAN. The meeting will come to order. Mr. Sloan, will you come forward, please?

STATEMENT OF GEORGE A. SLOAN

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. SLOAN. George A. Sloan.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. SLOAN. New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. Your occupation in New York City?

Mr. SLOAN. I am president of the Cotton Textile Institute, Senator, and chairman of the Cotton Textile Code Authority.

The CHAIRMAN. And are you now in Washington, D.C.?

Mr. SLOAN. I have been in Washington the greater part of the last 3 weeks, in connection with some work the general is having us do in the Consumers' Industries Group.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose you are thoroughly familiar with the codes that have been issued in the textile industry and the operations of those codes?

Mr. SLOAN. Well, sir, I think I have some knowledge of the cotton textile code but I would not say all the textile codes. There are quite a few of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The testimony yesterday was that there were a hundred of them.

Mr. SLOAN. I saw that statement. There are approximately four major codes in the industry, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. What are they?

Mr. SLOAN. The cotton textile code, the silk code, and the woolen code—I will confine it to three, because the rayon really is in the cotton code.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you wanted to rebut some testi mony that was introduced in here yesterday by the representative of the Textile Labor Union; is that correct?

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct, Senator, with your permission, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the representative of the United Textile Workers of America?

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed in your own way to make any statement you see fit.

Mr. SLOAN. Senator, may I say just a word in explanation? I happened to be in General Johnson's office this morning giving him some late information as to the practical effects of our code, and we went over some of the statements made yesterday, and we were very fearful that they would have a tendency of, not only injuring the industry itself, but of injuring the N.R.A. I have particular reference to the statement made by the witness that "in the absence of classification of wages in other classes above the minimum this has resulted in the lowering of the maximum wages down to the level of the minimum."

The CHAIRMAN. I think the witness probably meant down toward the level of the minimum. I do not think he meant to give the impression that the maximum wages were reduced to the minimum.

Mr. SLOAN. Assuming that you meant that, Senator, the statement is altogether contrary to the facts.

Now, what are the facts? The Cotton Textile Institute has been designated under the code as the agency to collect figures from the cotton mills. That statistical report was approved by the Administrator, and we are now receiving reports from practically 100 percent of the cotton mills, so the figures should give an accurate picture.

May I read just a few figures to lead up to that particular point because they have a bearing, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. Early in 1933 the employment in our industry was at the depression level, and the wage situation was highly unsatisfactory.

Now, the solution of that employment situation was approached, first, by a provision in the code for a shorter work week, and, second, by a provision limiting the operation of productive machinery to 80 hours weekly.

The first provision reduced the maximum hours of labor from 48 in your State, where you have a State law, 55 in the Carolinas, and the State law in Georgia, I think, is 60, and perhaps there are one or two States with no State restrictions at all. So, it had the practical effect, the 40-hour provision, of reducing the hours of work anywhere from 48 to 60 and above.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they all reduced to 40?

Mr. SLOAN. They were all reduced to 40. May I make one exception, sir? There is perhaps 5 percent of our workers that are excluded from the 40-hour provision.

The second provision had the effect of spreading the available business and consequently spreading the employment throughout all sections of this industry. The percentage of reduction in hours of labor in the cotton industry has unquestionably been greater than in any industry coming under codes.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. May I ask you to repeat that statement?

Mr. SLOAN. The percentage of reduction in the working time, the number of hours worked per week, has been greater in the cotton textile industry than perhaps in any industry in America as the result of the code.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose that is because of the unusually long hours of labor that some of the Southern States permit?

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct. That is not confined to the Southern States, Senator. It would be true, as compared to your State, but they operated as long as 54 hours in several of the New England States.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they New England States?

Mr. SLOAN. Correct, sir. In March 1933 the industry was providing work, not regular work, intermittent work, for 320,000 employees, and that was a number considerably below the predepression level. The anticipation of, and finally the adoption of, the 40-hour week under the code brought about a 44 percent increase in employment. Within 1 month of the adoption of the code—that is, in August 1933—we were employing 460,000 people, an increase of 140,000 employees over the March low.

The CHAIRMAN. For what months were the other figures?

Mr. SLOAN. August. I am going to bring it up to date if you wish.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there, independent of the N.R.A., an acceleration of business during that period?

Mr. SLOAN. There is a diversity of opinion, Senator, in the industry on that point. In my humble opinion I would give all the credit to N.R.A.

The CHAIRMAN. I have heard the two opinions expressed and that is why I asked.

Mr. SLOAN. The two opinions are expressed, but the fact of the matter is that in anticipation of the shorter hours that were coming—it was on the front pages of the papers for weeks before we had our code, everyone knew the hours would be materially shortened, and in anticipation of that the buyers, the wholesalers and retailers, and the cutters-up very naturally came in and anticipated their needs, so that it goes back, after all, to the code, that it was necessary to increase our employment.

Now, to bring this up to date, the March figures were 320,000.

The CHAIRMAN. I want you to speak of—you probably will come to it—you said there were two factors, one was the reduction in hours, and the other was the machine hour limitations. I want to discuss that in a moment, after you finish. You probably are going to do it anyway.

Mr. SLOAN. I had not intended to, but I will do it now if you wish.

The CHAIRMAN. After you have finished with the other.

Mr. SLOAN. In March 1933 we had 320,000 people on our pay rolls; in August, 460,000; in September, 461,000; in January, 430,000, and February, about 445,000.

Now, we have heard much about the 1926 level of employment. Secretary Perkins, in her speech the other day, before all of the code authorities, referred a number of times to what some industries had done, and what some had not accomplished as compared with 1926.

If one of the objectives of N.R.A. is to get back to 1926, the cotton textile industry under its code has attained that end. Secretary Perkins' figures will show for the month of February—I saw them yesterday—that our employment in the month of February was 101 percent plus of the 1926.

The CHAIRMAN. 1926 was not a maximum production year in the cotton textile business, was it?

Mr. SLOAN. We have not had a maximum production year for about 10 years, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I thought. My recollection is that there was quite a marked depression in the cotton textile business in 1924, 1925, and 1926.

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I remember very distinctly of it being a matter of political discussion in the campaigns of 1924 and 1926, and that the then minority party was accusing the dominant party in the Federal Government of being responsible for a depression in the cotton textile business. So, my recollection is that that year was not a normal production year.

Mr. SLOAN. I could show you the figures for that year, the monthly average for 1926, as compared with some of the other years. It was fairly close, Senator, to the top; 1927 was our best year in that period.

The CHAIRMAN. Production, probably, has gone to the South.

Mr. SLOAN. This is the whole industry.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand, but I mean what I observed in my own State.

Mr. SLOAN. That shift was taking place in those years. I think in the last 2 or 3 years the shift has almost completely stopped. About two thirds of the industry is now located in the South, and that has been true, I think, for the last 2 or 3 years, and the shifting has practically ceased.

The CHAIRMAN. Did it cease before 1929?

Mr. SLOAN. There are figures on that in the Department of Labor. I do not have them, sir. My general impression is that it was coming to an end at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The depression would cease the movement anyway, because there was less demand for cotton textiles anywhere?

Mr. SLOAN. The depression affected both sections alike. The shifting had about stopped.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no inducement for them to move their plants after 1929, or start new plants?

Mr. SLOAN. Just to give you quickly this picture, in 1925 we had a low point in those years. In 1924 it was 416,000; 1925, 445,000; and 1926, 444,000.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

Mr. SLOAN. The number of people employed. This was the monthly average for those years. Nineteen hundred and twenty-seven was our best year in the 10-year period. In 1927 we had 467,000.

The CHAIRMAN. So, you are practicly back in employment to the number of employees in 1924?

Mr. SLOAN. We are considerably ahead of 1924. We are ahead of 1926.

Senator DAVIS. How much are you ahead of 1926?

Mr. SLOAN. One hundred and one per cent, sir.

Senator THOMAS. One per cent.

Senator DAVIS. Nineteen hundred and twenty-six is the basis of 100 percent?

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct, sir.

Senator DAVIS. And you are 1 percent above that?

Mr. SLOAN. According to the figures which Secretary Perkins had, I do not have them, they are just out, it was 101 percent of 1926.

A comparison of the figures shows that employment in each of the 4 months, July to October 1933, exceeded the 1926 employment level, and almost equaled the employment level of 1923. We have discussed that and I will not trouble you with that further.

Now, as to the minimum wage, that was discussed at some length yesterday. In addition to increasing and spreading work, the code, by its provisions of minimum rates of pay substantially increased the wages of operators.

The new minimum rates provided by the code in many cases represented considerable increases in the lower brackets. I am not so proud to tell you this, Senator, but it is a fact that the code frequently entailed an increase of 100 percent in weekly wages, and increase in the hourly rate of 200 percent. That means that in many of our plants we were paying very low wages, wages that leaders in the industry, north and south, deplored, wages that we tried to correct as we were working on the question of hours, at the same time, but always without the assistance of a law behind us.

Now, the code also provided that the shorter work week should not yield any employee a less wage than such employee was receiving for the same class of work for the longer week of 48, 55 or 60 hours, prior to the code. I would like to emphasize that, sir, with your permission. There are three wage provisions in the cotton textile code, not one. Word has gone out all over this Nation, time after time, that the minimum wage in the cotton textile code is a low wage but it stopped there.

There are three fundamental wage provisions; there is the minimum wage, $12 in the South and $13 in the East; second, there is the provision that we have to pay at least as much for the 40 hours as you pay for 48, 55, or 60; and the third vitally important provision that the differentials existing in the higher occupational groups prior to the code must be preserved.

Now, I want to show you what is happening to those differentials. Before I come to that, though——

The CHAIRMAN. If the industry has been working its employees 48 and 54 hours and decided to go on 3 or 4 days a week, which would be less than 40 hours, would those employees get a 40-hour wage?

Mr. SLOAN. Prior to the code, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. No, since the code.

Mr. SLOAN. No, the code provides an hourly rate.

The CHAIRMAN. If the employee who had been working 48 or 52 hours, actually worked 40 hours, if his employer kept him at work 40 hours, he would be entitled to get the wage he got for the 48 or 54 hours previous to the code?

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But if the employer saw fit, or because of conditions could not provide, 40 hours, the employee would receive the pay for the actual number of hours which he worked?

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct, sir.

Senator DAVIS. Did you maintain the same production when you reduced the hours from 48 to 40 or from 54 to 40?

Mr. SLOAN. The production has been maintained, Senator. The production is greater today than it was prior to the code.

Mr. DAVIS. It is greater on 40 hours than it was on 48 or 54?

Mr. SLOAN. That is correct, sir. There is a very definite reason for that, Senator.

Senator DAVIS. What is the reason?

The CHAIRMAN. Because of the increase in employees idle machines have been put to work?

Mr. DAVIS. That is what I was trying to lead up to.

Mr. SLOAN. The reason being that prior to the code the operating hours of the machinery, we will say, was very irregular in our industry as between sections and as between different classes of manufacture. We had something like 8,000,000 spindles in the industry that regularly ran a single shift, that never ran a second shift. That was about a third of the industry. There are about 26,000,000 active spindles in the industry.

Now, when we came along with the code with its 80-hour machine limitation, that just stopped this midnight running, this all night running, and spread that business all over this country, north and south. That is why you are still getting the same production and even greater production, because you have made it possible for mills to live that could not live under the old regime. Do I make that clear? Many of those single shift mills are now in a position to put on a second shift of labor. There are a good many that have not as yet, but, I say, many have done so.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been a matter of agitation for several years in my State that the industries were handicapped by the laws forbidding them to use a second shift.

Mr. SLOAN. Your State had a law prohibiting the employment of women and minors at night. I think New York had that law but I think those two States were the only two in the textile industry that I recall at the moment.

Senator DAVIS. Could you give the number of additional workers that have been put on since the code?

Mr. SLOAN. One hundred and forty thousand. That is not since the code. I go back to March, Senator, because it is a better comparison for this reason. We started picking up our employment in anticipation of the code. The buyers came in and bought in such volume, knowing the code was coming, that it made it necessary to step up the employment month by month before we came to the code.

The CHAIRMAN. When was the code signed?

Mr. SLOAN. July 17, sir. It was effective July 17. It was signed about 2 weeks before, as I recall.

Senator DAVIS. Would you say, then, that since the adoption of the code there has been a wholesale improvement in the textile industry so far as the workers are concerned?

Mr. SLOAN. Correct, sir. I will go beyond that and say that so far as the mill communities are concerned, and so far as the industry is concerned.

Senator DAVIS. And so far as the investors in the industry are concerned?

Mr. SLOAN. Correct, sir. The industry has, by and large, come out of the red ink into a break-even position. I wish I could say more than that. There are some notable exceptions but they are relatively few. By and large, the industry has reached a break-even position under the code.

Senator DAVIS. What part of the machinery now in the cotton textile industry is obsolete? I mean by that, who are working old machines that are not modern?

Mr. SLOAN. I cannot give you that figure, Senator. I can say this to you, that it is most encouraging—this has a very direct bearing on your question but it does not answer it—the improvement in the installation of machinery for replacement and the balancing purposes, and for modernizing equipment was very pronounced in the last 6 months of the year. I have no figure but I have talked with a number of the textile machinery manufacturers, and their business has improved materially. Indeed, one or two have said it has improved tremendously for textile machines, and that their commitments ahead for this year are very large because the mills have suffered for so many years that there has not been an opportunity to replace old machinery that is gradually coming to them now under this code.

Senator DAVIS. Do you find a better spirit now among the workers, than you did prior to the adoption of the code or the reduction of hours?

Mr. SLOAN. We do, sir. I think there is no question about that. The workers are happier with the 40-hour week as against the 54 average. The industry averaged about 54.

Now, as to wages, the full-time weekly wages increased from $11.61, which was the low in April 1933 to $15.29 in November 1933 which was an increase of 31 percent. The average weekly earnings increased the same percentage in that period. The average hourly wage per capita increased from 21.5 cents in April 1933 to 36½ in November, which is an increase of 69 percent in the average hourly wage rate.

Let us see what that has done. The employees working 10 hours less per week—it is more than 10 hours less per week—were earning over $3 more on the average. A man working 40 hours on the average in this industry, the figures can be substantiated in the Department of Labor, and will show that they are getting on the average $3 more per week for 40 hours than they received for 54.

Now, this is the principal fact, Senator, which I wish to get before you, because it is vitally important. I can well understand that a code with a minimum provision and nothing beyond that might result in the lowering of the wages in the higher brackets. That is conceivable unless there is some other protection thrown about those workers. I think in most of the codes you will find some protection, some protective measure. In our code we have those two other provisions that I mentioned, the same pay for the 40 hours as they received for the longer week, and that the differentials must be preserved.

Now, then, the code has done more than to prevent minimum wages from becoming maximum wages. It has increased the maximum rates themselves, too.

Let us look at the figures. Slasher tenders in 1932 earned 1½ cents per hour more than weavers. Our reports for practically the entire industry, I should say 1,100 out of 1,200 mills, show that slasher tenders in August 1933 earned on the average 2.2 cents per hour more than weavers. They got 1½ cents more before, and that was the difference. Card grinders in 1932 earned 2½ cents more than weavers, and in August 1933, 3 cents more. Warp tying machine tenders in August 1932 earned 2½ cents more than weavers, in August 1933, 4½ cents more.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those pieceworkers?

Mr. SLOAN. Senator, I cannot answer that question. I could easily get that for you.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not common knowledge that weavers throughout the industry work by the piece?

Mr. SLOAN. In certain branches of the industry that is true; that is not true in all branches, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. It is certain that no manufacturer is letting me run a loom and the next man to me running a loom, and paying us both the same wages if I turn out twice as much cloth as he does.

Mr. SLOAN. Are you not speaking primarily of the fine-goods fabric in New England?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The bulk of that fabric is coarse fabric, like narrow sheetings, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. I have in mind also the woolen-carpet industry where the weavers are paid by the piece, and the woven-wire industry.

Senator DAVIS. That was my impression.

The CHAIRMAN. I have always had the impression that weaving was a piecework job, but I can conceive that perhaps on the cheapest grade of cloth in the South the rate might not be fixed in a piece basis, but I should think even there it would be. However you have more knowledge of it than I.

Mr. SLOAN. I will not qualify as an expert either.

The CHAIRMAN. The point I am trying to make is, if these people work by the piece, and they formerly worked 48 hours and they now only work 40 hours, and there has been a slight increase in their yardage for piecework, is not the net result that they may be getting a lower wage at 40 hours than at 48?

Mr. SLOAN. Well, Senator, I think I am going to answer your question as to the net results of what is happening.

The CHAIRMAN. It was called to our attention yesterday that the lowering of the hours of labor did not reduce the wages where there was a weekly wage or a definite fixed wage rather than the piecework wage, because of the proviso that they will not get less than 40 hours. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SLOAN. There is no proviso that they will not receive less than 40 hours work. The proviso is that they shall not work in excess of 40 hours.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, is not the proviso that they get the same pay for 40 hours as they did for 48 or 54?

Mr. SLOAN. If they work 40 hours.

The CHAIRMAN. So, it is quite likely that this man who testified yesterday may be correct in his assertion that because the number of hours have been reduced on piecework from 48 to 40, the net result is that at the end of the week an employee does not have as much money in his envelop as he did before. I am trying to reconcile the two different views. You have made it very clear that where the wages were paid by the hour he was mistaken in such general statement, and I would like to have your views about his statement of where the wages were paid for piecework.

Mr. SLOAN. I think in the figures I am going to show you of what has actually happened to the pay rolls will bear out my statement that these minimums have not become the maximums.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give us any figures as to the percentage of workers who worked on a per hour basis, a per week basis, and how many worked on a piece basis?

Mr. SLOAN. I happened to meet a prominent mill executive in the hotel as I came down, who is now in the room, and if you would not mind asking that question of Mr. W. S. Nicholson, of Union, S.C., I believe he can answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to do so.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Nicholson, will you answer the question of the Senator? What is the percentage of weavers that are working on a weekly basis as against those that work on a piecework basis?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I do not know of any cases where weavers work on a regular weekly basis.

The CHAIRMAN. Per hour basis, most of them?

Mr. NICHOLSON. It is those rates.

The CHAIRMAN. That is my impression, that the great bulk of the textile employees work on a piecework basis.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Right. I should say about 80 percent of the entire industry.

Mr. SLOAN. I think we are together on this, but I would like to ask him a question, Senator. As a matter of fact, have not the weavers worked pretty much all of their 40 hours in all of the plants under the code?

Mr. NICHOLSON. Pretty much all of it?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; generally speaking.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Yes; I would think so.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not hear the question, and ansswer.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I asked if the weavers had worked pretty much up to the 40-hour maximum since the code went into effect.

Mr. NICHOLSON. And I said I should think they had. In some case cases there has been some curtailment.

The CHAIRMAN. But there was no provision in the code—see if we agree upon this, and I am only doing this for the purpose of reconciling the difference between you and the witness yesterday—there is no provision in the code that guarantees the same rate for 40 hours' work that he got for 48 hours. Is that right, Mr. Sloan?

Mr. SLOAN. The hourly rate is guaranteed, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that.

Mr. SLOAN. I see. There is nothing that guarantees him an average week's work?

The CHAIRMAN. Now, according to his testimony we are dealing with 80 percent of the employees, and so far as the 20 percent are concerned, you are probably right.

Mr. SLOAN. Not 80 percent of the employees. He made the statement that it was 80 percent of the weavers. That is not 80 percent of the number of employees.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I mean 80 percent of all employees.

Mr. SLOAN. Now on a piecework basis?

Mr. NICHOLSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I thought you said the weavers?

Mr. NICHOLSON. No; all the weavers, as far as I know, are on the piecework basis.

Mr. SLOAN. I stand corrected on that.

The CHAIRMAN. In my own community I have been in contact with the situation and have some knowledge of the extent of the employees being engaged on piecework.

Mr. SLOAN. I stand corrected on that, sir, because looking at the figures here and giving my answer to you in the light of the statistics I see coming over my desk, week after week, they did not show very much piecework. In other words, they show they are working up around 40 hours. We have been running pretty full as an industry for the past 7 or 8 months except during the month of December.

The CHAIRMAN. It is possible under the code, and this is not criticism of the code at all, that a man might well as a weaver, get less wages per week than he used to get, because he is only working 40 hours a week.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not know. I wish you would ask that question of Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. NICHOLSON. What was the question?

The CHAIRMAN. A weaver that worked in your plant for 54 hours—was that the number of hours you worked in your plant?

Mr. NICHOLSON. We worked 55.

The CHAIRMAN. Does he get for 40 hours of piecework the same wages he formerly got for 55?

Mr. NICHOLSON. Yes, sir; and not only in my plant, but all the industry as a whole, because the piecework rates were adjusted to enable the pieceworker to earn the earnings that prevailed prior to the code going into effect.

The CHAIRMAN. That would require a substantial increase in the piece rate.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I believe that is true in our plant, and I think that is true in most of the plants.

Mr. SLOAN. Senator, there are some other figures that may help us in this discussion. The average rate in 1932 was seven higher occupational groups, where earnings, according to Government reports, were more than the minimum wage prescribed by the code, was 35 cents an hour. In August 1933 the average for these same groups was 44 cents, an increase of about 25 percent in the hourly rate. These averages include all kinds of cotton mills, the case such as you have in Massachusetts of the fine goods, and the cheapest and coarsest type of fabrics.

Now, with respect to pay rolls, a striking reflection of the increase of employment and wage improvement is afforded by the industry's pay rolls.

For the week ending nearest to the 15th of the month the pay roll for March was $2,957,000. In June it was $4,498,000; in July, $5,000,000; in August, $6,000,000, and it has stuck very close to that.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the total for the industry?

Mr. SLOAN. That is the total weekly pay roll for the week nearest to the 15th of the month.

The CHAIRMAN. How many plants, approximately?

Mr. SLOAN. Well, approximately 1,200 plants, ranging from 50 employees to several thousand.

Weekly pay rolls have risen from $3,000,000 in March, to $6,000,000 in October, an increase of 100 percent. The pay roll in November was actually 92 percent over March 1933.

The important thing is what has happened to real wages. That is what we want to know. What has happened to real wages? These increased pay rolls have meant an increase in real wages, that is, an increase in purchasing power.

If we take the figures of the National Industrial Conference Board, in January 1934, they show about a 28 percent increase over March 1933 and are 10 percent higher than in 1926.

Senator, that was the information that I was anxious to get before you.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been very helpful. May I ask you another question? What increase has there been in the cost of cotton cloth as a result of these increased wages?

Mr. SLOAN. That varies according to the type of cloth.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but is there any information that you can give us?

Mr. SLOAN. I think I can send your committee a pretty full record of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, in view of your statement as to the percentage increase in wages, and the fact that these industries have come out of the red into the black, in all probability that has been in some part due to increased price.

Mr. SLOAN. Bear in mind, Senator, too, that the price of cotton has gone up 100 percent, and on top of that we have the processing tax.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been very substantial increase in the cost of production.

Mr. SLOAN. In the selling price, did you say?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the consumer's price.

Mr. SLOAN. May I ask Mr. Nicholson how the prices compare?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Not quite twice as much.

The CHAIRMAN. I am very glad you appeared, Mr. Sloan, because I really got the impression myself, and I think the committee did, that there were many cases of pieceworkers—and this is not critical at all—who really had their pay envelops reduced by the 40-hour requirements.

Mr. SLOAN. Senator, with your permission, I would like to make a hurried check in all of my records and I may be able to submit some data on that point. I am sorry I was not better informed.

The CHAIRMAN. You certainly have enlightened the committee.

Mr. SLOAN. We did not want the impression to go out as it has gone out before, that the minimum wage has become the maximum wage. That hurts our industry and hurts the N.R.A.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone else wish to be heard?

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Davis would like to have inserted in the record a letter addressed to John L. Lewis, president United Mine Workers of America, from B. C. Miller, president Local No. 6290, United Mine Workers of America, Nemacolin, Pa. Is this letter in favor of this legislation?

Senator DAVIS. It is.

(The letter referred to by the chairman is as follows:)

NEMACOLIN, PA., March 19, 1934.

JOHN L. LEWIS,
President United Mine Workers of America,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: At a recent meeting of local no. 6290, United Mine Workers of America, located at Nemacolin, Greene County, Pa., I was directed to write you concerning the activities of the Buckeye Coal Co. in violation of section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act, relative to collective bargaining.

In order to thoroughly acquaint you with the situation at this mine, it is necessary that I give you detailed information concerning the same.

Prior to the passage of the National Recovery Act, this mine was unorganized, having neither organized labor or a company union. Immediately after the passage of the act, the mine was organized 100 percent United Mine Workers of America, and continued working without any objection on the part of the company. After the dispute with the H. C. Frick Coke Co. and the United Mine Workers, the Buckeye Coal Co. endeavored to organize a company-controlled union, called the "brotherhood." This mine was shut down on account of the strike last fall and did not open again until some time in January of this year. After repeated efforts, an election was held to choose representatives, under supervision of the Labor Board, and the United Mine Workers were victorious—489 to 247. So far a contract has not been entered into with the company by the chosen representatives.

Prior to this election, the company hired several deputy sheriffs, who, after complaint, were discharged by the sheriff of this county; then the company petitioned the courts of this county and designated several individuals to be night watchmen; since that time they have had 3 shifts of 8 men each, patroling the property of this company, and intimidating and coercing members of the United Mine Workers to become members of the organized company brotherhood.

The Buckeye Coal Co., at the present time, will not hire any person who does not agree to become a member of its brotherhood; most of its foremen and pit bosses are members of the brotherhood and constantly making working conditions for union men unbearable. They also refuse to permit the union men to hand out check-off cards to the members of the United Mine Workers.

In addition to these matters, the company only hire men for 10, 20, or 30 days, constantly holding this as a threat over their heads to keep them becoming members of the United Mine Workers, and if they don't join the brotherhood at the end of this time, they are immediately discharged.

Several members of the United Mine Workers have been discharged for very trivial matters, and we allege the principal reason is that they were members of the union. Also the company is importing men from other localities and employing them in preference to men who have worked for them and live in the company town, presumably on account of the men living there being members of the union.

The men are very anxious that this letter be read before the Senate committee at the hearings on the Senator Wagner bill, and, if necessary, several of the men will attend in person to substantiate the charges set forth in this letter.

There is no question but what the company is determined to defeat the rights of its members to collective bargaining, and unless the Wagner bill is approved in its present form and some authority vested in a national labor board to combat the activities of the company, sooner or later the company will win out, so you can readily see the necessity of labor having some protection.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

B. C. MILLER,
President, Local No. 6290, United Mine Workers of America.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand adjourned until Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon at 3:15 p.m. the committee was recessed until Monday, Mar. 26, 1934, at 10 a.m.)

TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1934

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a.m., in the caucus room, Washington, D.C., Senator David I. Walsh (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murphy, Thomas, Erickson, Borah, Walcott, and Davis.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Mr. Emery, are you ready to proceed?

Mr. EMERY. I am, sir.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR DAVID I. WALSH

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate is in session this morning, conducting a hearing on Senate bill 2926, introduced by Senator Wagner. In view of the fact that the proceedings are to be on the radio, I will make a brief statement to inform those listening in of earlier proceedings. The Democratic members of this committee are as follows: David I. Walsh, Massachusetts, chairman; Royal S. Copeland, New York; Park Trammell, Florida; Hugo L. Black, Alabama; Louis Murphy, Iowa; Elbert D. Thomas, Utah; John E. Erickson, Montana. The Republican members are: William E. Borah, Idaho; Jesse H. Metcalf, Rhode Island; Frederic C. Walcott, Connecticut; Robert M. La Follette, Jr., Wisconsin; James J. Davis, Pennsylvania.

The title of Senate bill 2926 is:

> To equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees, to create a National Labor Board, and for other purposes.

Since Wednesday, March 14, the committee has been holding daily sessions. A vast amount of evidence has been submitted by representatives of organized labor, students of industrial relations, delegations from employees, and various citizens who have been serving on the National Recovery Labor Board, which has been dealing with the labor disputes arising out of the codes adopted by the National Recovery Act.

This morning, the committee will hear James A. Emery, who is General Counsel for the National Manufacturers' Association, and who has, for years, represented the employers' side of industrial questions affecting the public interest, before committees of the Congress.

The bill which we are considering, has as its objective the creation of a National Labor Board, which shall have the power to interpret and administer section 7–A of the National Recovery Act.

Section 7–A of the National Recovery Act is a provision, incorporated into that law, for the employment of certain rights by employees in industry.

The National Recovery Act, briefly stated, is a law passed by the Congress, for the purpose of helping to bring about the recovery of industry, by repealing some of the laws that industry believed were retarding recovery. It was referred to, at the time it was passed, as a partnership between the Government and employers, for the purpose of removing ruthless competition in industry, and for helping industry to get back on a profit-making basis, and to maintain the former high standard of wages and labor conditions that prevailed during the era of prosperity. One of its objectives also was to lessen the hours of labor, so as to spread out employment, and also to maintain a reasonably high wage, in order to maintain the purchasing power of the country, notwithstanding the reduction of hours of labor.

In the National Recovery Act there was incorporated a section known as section 7–A, which, for the first time in a legislative act, declared certain rights in behalf of employees.

The bill now before us is the outcome of this declaration of labor rights in section 7–A. Section 7–A conceded to labor the following rights (abbreviated):

> Every code agreed to under the National Recovery Act, shall contain the following abbreviated provisions:
>
> 1. That employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from interference or coercion of employers of labor or their agents in the designation of such representatives.
> 2. That no employee shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join any company union or be restricted from joining organizations or assisting any labor organization of his own choosing—

Quoting from the law. The Labor Board set up by President Roosevelt to give force and effect to this section, namely, section 7–A of the National Recovery Act, has been operating since the passage of this law. It is composed of 11 members, 5 representing labor, 5 representing employers, and Senator Wagner, of New York, is the chairman of this Board.

Many of the members of this Board, particularly the labor members and Senator Wagner, claim to have discovered many alleged defects in the administration of section 7–A. These defects, they claim, are numerous, and it is a result of the defects which they allege were discovered in the administration of section 7–A that this bill was presented to the Congress.

The chief claim made, and perhaps the chief defect asserted, is that there can be no real collective bargaining under section 7–A, unless the law is strengthened. The reason, they urge, is that real collective bargaining is not possible where unions of employees are organized under the direction, through the influence, and with the approval of employers. These unions, called "company unions", have grown up rapidly since the passage of N.R.A. The Labor Board asserts that practically all the labor disputes that have arisen since N.R.A. have been as a result of clashes between employees and the employers, growing out of the insistence upon the part of employers, in organizing company unions, and thereby denying the employer freedom of organization.

Now, as to the enforcement sections of the bill, the present Labor Board asserts that is has sought to apply section 7–A, by relying upon the prestige of its members, and by appealing to public sentiment. During the summer months, they say these methods met with great success, but in recent months the Board has been confronted by some large employers—of course, presented by members of the Labor Board—"who ignore public sentiment, who flaunt the clear intent of Congress, and who are a law unto themselves." These words are Senator Wagner's own words. This, they say, "is extremely unfair to the vast majority of employers, who want to obey the law, and disheartening to the millions of working people who see that which was held up to them as a new charter, being treated as a "scrap of paper."

The bill, presented to the Congress for approval, provides for a permanent board, with adequate enforcement provisions. It defines as unfair labor practice any attempt by employers to dominate labor unions or to fail to recognize the duly chosen representatives of their employees. It also defines several other practices of employees as unfair.

When complaint is made of an unfair labor practice, the Board is authorized to hold meetings, subpena witnesses and records, and if the law is violated, issue a restraining order enforceable in the court. The Labor Board is empowered to act also as conciliator and mediator.

Very briefly, this outlines the objective of the bill which is now under consideration by this committee, and I will now ask Mr. Emery, who is the representative and attorney of the National Manufacturers' Association, to address the committee.

Mr. Emery, your full name.

Mr. EMERY. James A. Emery.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. EMERY. Washington, or Chevy Chase, Md.

The CHAIRMAN. Attorney at law?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent, in appearing this morning before this committee?

Mr. EMERY. I speak for the National Association of Manufacturers, and for some 38 State associations of manufacturers, a list of which I file with the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. How many manufacturers do these associations represent?

Mr. EMERY. Between forty-five and fifty thousand, roughly speaking.

The CHAIRMAN. What class of manufacturers?

Mr. EMERY. If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I will cover that in the statement, if I may go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. EMERY. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Emery.

STATEMENT OF JAMES A. EMERY

Mr. EMERY. I am general counsel, National Association of Manufacturers, representing that organization and the below listed State Associations of Manufacturers in opposition to the Wagner bill (S. 2926) before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, Monday, March 26, 1934, opening the testimony for opponents: Associated Industries of Alabama, California Manufacturers Association, Manufacturers' Association of Connecticut, Associated Industries of Florida, Georgia Manufacturers' Association, Illinois Manufacturers' Association, Indiana Manufacturers' Association, Iowa Manufacturers' Association, Associated Industries of Kansas, Associated Industries of Kentucky, Associated Industries of Maine, Associated Industries of Massachusetts, Michigan Manufacturers' Association, Minnesota Employers' Association, Associated Industries of Missouri, Associated Industries of Montana, Ohio Manufacturers' Association, Associated Industries of Oklahoma, Utah Associated Industries, Associated Industries of Vermont, Virginia Manufacturers Association, Federated Industries of Washington, Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association, Colorado Manufacturers and Merchants' Association, Manufacturers' Association of Wilmington, Louisiana Manufacturers' Association, Nebraska Manufacturers' Association, New Hampshire Manufacturers' Association, Associated Industries of New York State, Inc., Manufacturers & Merchants' Association of Oregon, Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association, Associated Industries of Rhode Island, Manufacturers and Employers' Association of South Dakota, Tennessee Manufacturers Association, Texas State Manufacturers Association, West Virginia Manufacturers' Association, Manufacturers' Association of New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that the organization for which I speak represents many thousands of manufacturers engaged in every form of industrial production, throughout the various States of the Union. They include every shade of industrial employment, large and small. They represent every form of individual and collective agreement. Some deal exclusively with organized labor. More do not. They number plants regarded by personnel specialists as world models in social equipment and organization.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I trust, in what the chair has said in opening the discussion, he has not indicated, before hearing the case for those who disagree with many features of this measure, a conclusion which I know the committee will build only upon the evidence and arguments submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt you a moment? I would not have made any statement at all, but I thought it was unfair to the public, who have not been following the course of these hearings, to have one introduced who appeared in opposition to the bill, without having any presentation made of what the claim was by those who are defending the bill. I tried to make a fair statement of what I understand to be the proponents' position. I had only about 2 minutes in which to prepare it, because I expected somebody else to go forward and make a statement in favor of the bill. By a brief statement of the claims made for the bill, I thought I was helping to inform those who were listening on the radio, what the objectives of this bill were.

Mr. EMERY. We are very confident of the Senator's fairness. We only wanted to indicate our confidence in it.

Senator WAGNER. I am sorry that the broadcasting company was not as interested in broadcasting this hearing when those in favor of the bill appeared before the committee.

Mr. EMERY. May I proceed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. EMERY. Referring now to those whom I have the honor to represent, may I continue, that many have builded systems of collective relationships over many years. Others are more recent. Often they were initiated by the management and perfected by the men. Some have brought both groups through these trying years with new faith in each other; their mutual good will tested by reciprocal sacrifice. Yet all that they have done would be abrogated by this bill. We are not here to defend all employers or to condone their misconduct. There are doubtless bad company organizations, just as there are bad unions.

We resent the suggestion that the normal conduct of the employers shall be outlawed, and the abnormal conduct of other groups shall be encouraged by law. We therefore oppose the measure before you, because we believe it invalid in law and unsound in policy. We will demonstrate it is not an exercise of the commerce power of Congress, but a deliberate and indefensible invasion of the right to regulate and even compel local employment relations, which the Supreme Court, without exception, has declared are exclusively a subject for State and not Federal control; but, assuming the bill were within the commerce power, the administrative body established, the authority proposed, the manner of its exercise, are arbitrary, destructive of the fundamental rights of the parties, and vest in an administrative body the determination of questions of fact and law, without judicial review, that may be adjudicated only by a court. Without itself being bound by the rules of evidence, the bill undertakes to compel the reviewing court to be bound by the Board's findings of fact. The Board is neither required to give reasonable notice of the character of the complaint nor the time of its hearing. It sets up as offenses a series of acts so vaguely described as to violate the essential requirements of a penal statute. Many of such acts represent the normal and necessary intercourse between employer and employee.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, do you mind being interrupted as you proceed, with questions from the committee, or would you like to finish your statement before being interrrogated?

Mr. EMERY. Well, I would like to make a main statement, Mr. Chairman, if I may. Then I will be glad to submit to inquiries.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Senator Wagner and members of the committee may want to interrogate you later.

Mr. EMERY. Certainly. The prohibition of such acts would destroy the natural and valid relationship between them. In form and substance, the measure violates elementary principles of justice and fair play.

The policy of the measure would not equalize the bargaining power of the employer and employee, as the title suggests, nor do we believe it would encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between them. On the contrary, analysis shows it to be so designed as to prevent the employer from exercising the natural circumstance of bargaining, impair its nature and extent, gratuitously presumes that he only exercises coercion in the employment relation, or indulges in unfair practices. This assertion, I may say with marked emphasis, is illuminated by a statement in settlement of a dispute in labor relations, that has attracted the attention of the United States. The President there declared:

> The Government makes clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice, without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.

To continue, we say, therefore, we do not believe the policy of this measure, as we analyze it, would equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, as its title suggests, nor encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between them. On the contrary, analysis shows it to be designed to prevent the employer from exercising the natural circumstances of bargaining, impairs its nature and extent, gratuitously presumes that he only exercises coercion in the employment relation, or indulges in unfair practices; makes no effort to define, regulate, or prohibit the equally reprehensible and long-recognized practices and abuses of labor organizations, destructive of the rights of their fellow workers, of employers, and of the public. And I beg to call the committee's attention to the very pertinent remarks of that distinguished Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, Mr. Brandeis, in the latest addition of his work on Business as a Profession, where he says:

> The practical immunity of the union from legal liability is deemed by many labor leaders a great advantage. To me, it appears to be just the reverse. It tends to make officers and members reckless and lawless, and thereby to alienate public sympathy and bring failure upon their effort. It creates, on the part of the employers, also, a bitter antagonism, not so much on account of lawless acts as from a deep-rooted sense of injustice, arising from the feeling that while the employer is subject to law, the union holds a position of legal irresponsibility. It has been objected to by some of the labor leaders—> that incorporation of the unions would expose to loss the funds which have been collected as insurance against sickness, accident, and enforced idleness; that these funds might be reached to satisfy claims made for wrongs alleged to have been committed by the union. I can conceive of no expenditure of money by a union which could bring so large a return as the payment of compensation for some wrong actually committed by it. Any such payment would go far in curbing the officers and members of the union from future transgression of the law, and it would, above all, establish the position of the union as a responsible agent in the community, ready to abide by the law. This would be of immense advantage to the union in all its operations. Again, it has been urged that the incorporation of the union would lead to a multiplication of lawsuits, which would involve the union in great expense; but the expense of conducting such litigation would be insignificant as compared with the benefits which would result to the union from holding a recognized and responsible position in the community. * * * The unions should take the position squarely that they are amenable to law, prepared to take the consequences if they transgress, and thus show that they are in full sympathy with the spirit of our people, whose political system rests upon the proposition that this is a government of law, and not of men.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the end of the quotation?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. In that connection, I beg to all the attention of the committee to the fact, to illustrate exactly what the Justice says, that when the Lockwood committee, appointed by the Legislature of New York, was investigating housing conditions in its chief city, on April 21 and 22, and May 4, 1922, many witnesses, representing the labor and employers' organizations of the city of New York were examined by the counsel of the committee, Mr. Samuel Untermeyer. As the result—to which I shall refer later—of that investigation, 416 officers of labor organizations and employers whom, by collusive agreements or by special individual actions, had been guilty of serious offenses against the law, criminal in nature, were indicted and convicted, and more than $550,000 in fines were assessed against both. And, sir, there is no more reprehensible injurious, or socially dangerous form of agreement to the injury of the public, than collusive agreement between employers and employees, by which each, in return for concessions, rob the public and we denounce and condemn them both.

Senator WAGNER. So do I.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we will all agree to that statement.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. I want to point out later that these things may all occur under the terms of this bill. I want to point out, to apply the bill. The fact that at the present time in the city of New York has been thrown into civil disorder by a strike between taxicab drivers and their employers, in which the streets of the city have been the scene of public disorder. Men have been assaulted, women have been insulted, passengers have been injured, property has been destroyed; and the mayor has, for a time at least, been unable to keep the peace of the city. I shall show you presently, if this bill were in effect, those very strikers, guilty of those very acts, would still be, within the contemplation of the law, "employees" of their employers; and their employers, under penalty of the law, would be required to recognize them and their representatives and would either deal with them, or be guilty of an "unfair labor practice", under the terms of this act. A bill that undertakes to accomplish such a result is not worthy of the support and approval of the Congress of the United States.

Referring to the Lockwood Investigating Committee, that I may not overlook the purpose for which I called it to your attention, I want to point out the deplorable fact tnat representative leaders of the great organizations of labor have continuously insisted that they must not be required to accept corrections by law for the evils which arise in their ranks, that those evils must be corrected by the moral evolution, if you please, of the organization itself, rather than by any correction in law.

So, Mr. Untermeyer, in his examination of Mr. Gompers, the distinguished president of the American Federation of Labor, called his attention at page 6798 of the record, to the evidence before them that men had been expelled from the carpenters' local union because they had assumed to criticize the activities of one Brindell, then serving a term in the State prison for extortion.

He was asked if he remembered that and knew it, and he said, "Yes."

"And you know that they have no redress today, as the law stands, do you not?" said Mr. Untermeyer.

"Redress in the courts?" said Mr. Gompers.

"Redress anywhere?" said Mr. Untermeyer.

"Not at this moment", replied Mr. Gompers.

"And until the labor movement", said Mr. Untermeyer, "is so far advanced in its evolution toward perfection, that that redress is available to men situated as these men are, you would not countenance, or you would not approve of the courts of justice giving them any redress, or giving the power to the courts of justice to do so?

Mr. Gompers replied: "I should be opposed to it."

Mr. Untermeyer called attention to the fact that in the erection of the Ambassador Hotel, a well-known edifice in the city of New York, the owner had mantels made of a kind which enabled the affixing of the mantel to the building at less cost than their other methods. The plasterers compelled the builder to destroy these mantels and substitute others to be attached by a more costly method. The testimony is at page 6858 of the record, and Mr. Untermeyer asked:

"Don't you think that if such a practice is indulged in under resolution of the union, that the employer who suffered that loss should have a remedy in damages against the union for the one-hundred-and-odd mantels that he lost in that way?"

"No", said Mr. Gompers.

Question. "You think he should have no remedy whatever?"

Answer. "Not by a recourse to any new law."

Question. "Where should the remedy be, what remedy should he have?" asked Mr. Untermeyer.

And the answer of Mr. Gompers was, "He has none. That is the risk of the industry."

It would be a still greater risk of the industry when the provisions of this act, as we construe them, are put into effect.

Then Mr. Untermeyer asked, "Isn't it true in every department of the building industry?" referring to the conditions to which he has been inquiring. "Can you name one in which there are not such abuses and acts of oppression inaugurated in the last 5 years, and on the increase? Can you name any industry in the building trades in which that is not true? If you can't, I will confront you with one."

Mr. Gompers replied, "I understand that through your instrumentality, some of them have been abated."

The testimony continues at great length, and I call your attention only to one quotation, not because I want to direct your attention to the specific condition in a particular city, but because I want to call your attention to a condition that has been disclosed in many cities of the United States. The records of the courts are full of them. They all go to one point that I want to emphasize, and that is the serious lack of responsibility on the part of those who will be given the tremendous social power which this bill would create by Government aid.

So, Mr. Untermeyer asked, at page 7182:

In the last 5 years, is there a single reform in all constitutions and bylaws of these different unions, in some of which there are as many as 50 abuses in a single union?

Mr. Gompers answers, "Probably."

Mr. Untermeyer says, "Has one been reformed"?

The answer is, "Not those to which you refer."

Question: "Any others, can you refer to one that has been reformed in 5 years in any union in greater New York?"

Answer: "I cannot say that I can."

Having presented that testimony, the purpose of which the committee will see in its relationship to the subsequent analysis of the measure, I proceeded to say that that bill by its terms and procedure as we think can be made evident, will excite irritation, resentment, and bitterness in employment relations, requiring the steady development of sympathy, good will, and understanding. It will stimulate complaints, promote the interruption of employment, and deliberately undertake by its definitions and oepration to force employees into one form of labor organization—the union. It will secure through the union, monopolistic control; assuring the unrestricted use of the strike, and thus confer the power to assess the public with the cost of sustaining a labor monopoly, maintained with Federal aid, relieved of appropriate legal control, and without corresponding responsibility for the cats of its agents.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by the word "union"?

Mr. EMERY. I mean a labor union of the type—an external union.

The CHAIRMAN. What is called a trade union?

Mr. EMERY. A trade union; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had discussion before the committee of two classes of unions.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The trade union and the company union. You have used the particular word "union."

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the trade union?

Mr. EMERY. I mean the trade union.

The CHAIRMAN. Independent from the company union?

Mr. EMERY. Let me say in that connection, Mr. Chairman, so that there may be no misunderstanding of our position, that we have no criticism whatever of labor unions as such. We recognize, as do all men, the right of men to associate themselves for any legal purpose, and to attain it by any legal means.

We speak here constantly of "company unions." I do not precisely know what a "company union" is, but I will make myself clear if I can by injecting a guess at it. I assume that by a company union is meant an organization of employees within the company dominated by it, controlled by it, to such an extent that when the company deals with it, it is dealing with itself.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't think that is quite the claim here. There is a claim that there are dominated company unions.

Mr. EMERY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. But there is also a claim made here by some of the witnesses that there are company unions that are not dominated, and I understand that nobody at any time makes objection to such, but there is strenuous objection to what you have defined as a company union, namely, the dominated one.

Mr. EMERY. Certainly, and I should say it is as objectionable to us as it is to you.

I want to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that when we are discussing this bill, as I shall presently show you, and I may be wrong, I want to show you that the form of operation of this bill is such that an employee representation plan formed 30 years ago, or 40 years ago, with the complete cooperation, and, indeed, perfected, by the men, will be abrogated by this law, and destroyed, that this bill requires that it be done. As I proceed with the argument, I will make that clear.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask just two questions, to see if we have a common basis?

Mr. EMERY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you to say, representing the Manufacturers' Association, that you recognize the right of employees to join labor unions.

Mr. EMERY. I said I recognized the right of men to form themselves into any legal organization for the protection of their hours, wages, and working conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. EMERY. I recognize the right of the employer to deal with them or refrain from dealing with them as they may merit for the purpose of bargaining, because I want to make it clear here—I think it is one of the things overlooked in controversies—that the right to organize any association does not carry with it by that fact a duty on the part of everyone else to deal with it on its terms. Men may organize a corporation, but it does not carry any obligation on the part of the public to deal with them when it is organized, if it happens to be a merchandising or manufacturing corporation.

A union, or any other organization of working men must attract those who wish to deal with it by the character of its membership, by the performance of its contracts, by its other evidence which it gives of good conduct and responsibility through which relations between men are established and sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner wants to ask you a few questions.

Senator WAGNER. This might be an appropriate time to do it; otherwise, I would not want to interrupt you. From what you say, Mr. Emery, there is no difference of opinion between you and me as to the right of men to organize and to bargain collectively, that they may either organize and join an outside trade organization, or they may have an independent organization within the particular industry or even within the particular plant. I am trying to further that right in this legislation. The thing I oppose is the very thing which you say is reprehensible, namely, that there should be a union dominated by the employer, so that he controls both sides of the bargain.

Now, if we agree on that, then there is no difference of opinion between us so far as the objective is concerned, and if this bill does not provide that objective, I think the most constructive kind of criticism would be to suggest language which would bring about that objective rather than a general denunciation which does not get us anywere.

Mr. EMERY. Of course, now, Senator——

Senator WAGNER. May I say this?

Mr. EMERY. May I answer? Did you not ask me a question?

Senator WAGNER. Very well.

Mr. EMERY. May I answer it?

Senator WAGNER. Surely.

Mr. EMERY. I know if you ask me a question, you will give me the privilege of answering it.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. I think if the Senator would go 1 step or 2 steps further, we might find ourselves in complete agreement, instead of partial agreement which he suggests.

Senator WAGNER. I thought I suggested a complete agreement.

Mr. EMERY. We object to coercion from any source, whether by employer or labor organization.

Senator WAGNER. I was coming to that next point. May I, then?

Mr. EMERY. I will cover that next. May I go just one step further now? The Senator says one must make a constructive suggestion. You cannot criticize anything without offering a constructive substitute. Now, of course, if a man were going to walk through a window and fall 10 stories, the most constructive thing to do would be to stop him, and not suggest a different method of falling, either by the stairs, or through another window.

As Frank Kent has said in a recent article commenting on those who criticize and merely offer resistance to an utterly unsound proposition, if someone suggests that 2 and 2 make 5, it is not a constructive suggestion to say that it obviously makes 4 and nothing else. A really constructive criticism would be to say, "Well, it may make 6 or 7."

So, it seems to me there are two very clear issues involved here that the Senator with his distinguished career on the bench, as well as in the Senate, will recognize. One is a serious question of law, and the other is quite as serious, a question of policy. If it is not within the power of Congress to establish the kind of a tribunal to exercise the kind of power which the Senator undertakes to create, it is the part of good citizenship to resist that kind of a proposal.

Senator WAGNER. Well, as to the particular instrumentality set up, there can be a difference of opinion about that, there is no doubt about that; but, I am very anxious to hear your views about that, but the point I made is that we do not apparently—I think there have been so many misrepresentations in the papers about company unions, not distinguishing between company unions and company dominated unions—the point I wanted to bring out was that apparently you and I do not disagree at all upon the proposition that, in the first place they ought to have the right to organize if they wish to, and that when they do organize that they ought to organize free from any coercion, or intimidation by any employer, so that the employer does not control both sides of the bargaining power.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. So, we are in absolute agreement on that point, practically.

Mr. EMERY. Only, Senator; if you will permit me, we will be in agreement if you stop at the word "coercion" and add "from any source", as the President says——

Senator WAGNER. Wait a minute. I am coming to that next. The only reason that was not put in there, and I think this is a very fair criticism, and it ought to be put in the act, you know as an attorney that employers—having been for a long time a vigorous counsel for employers—that the courts whenever you have applied, have invariably restrained any acts of coercion or intimidation on the part of workers, so that that right already exists and has been definitely recognized by the courts.

Mr. EMERY. I beg your pardon, Senator; will you permit me there?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. As a Member of Congress, you have seen fit to undertake to practically destroy the power of the courts to do that in the Norris-LaGuardia injunction bill.

Senator WAGNER. Well, I did not so understand that power. That was passed by almost unanimous vote.

Mr. EMERY. I thought from your vigorous speech when you supported the bill, that you did so understand it.

Senator WAGNER. My vigorous speech indicated that when questions of intimidation, violation, and coercion are concerned, that the courts still have the power to restrain, and I made that very clear in my speech. You do not do me the honor of reading it carefully.

Mr. EMERY. I thought I did, Senator. I agree with you.

Senator WAGNER. So far as your proposition is concerned, I think the bill ought to be amended so as to include intimidation or coercion from any source, if there is any question as to whether the courts have not already ruled time and time again that they will restrain any such acts when the worker exercises them. I want to have that there.

Now, I think the act ought to be amended just as you suggested, that is, intimidation, when it comes from any source, either a trade organization, or a company union, or an employer, or to be made an unfair labor practice, so that we are in agreement on that.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. I made a number of assertions about this bill, Mr. Chairman, and before analyzing the bill now, and applying these terms, I want to undertake, if I may, to remove certain impressions created by the testimony of proponents, which seems to me a necessary preliminary.

It has been steadily asserted that during the months which have elapsed since the adoption of the Recovery Act, the condition of labor has not been improved; its protection under the codes has been denied and defied; hours have been little reduced, and minimum wages have tended to become maximums.

Taking last December as a standard in formation, from the Department of Labor will show that in 15 great categories of American industry, the average work week has declined 4 hours, to an average of about between 36 and 37 per week, although the volume of business has in the meantime risen 13 percent, and in 21 representative manufacturing industries the average hourly earnings—earnings, now, and not wages—have increased to a point, roughly, but 7 percent below the 1929 rate. In four major industries, they are higher than in 1929. In bituminous coal they are within 4 cents an hour of the 1929 rate, and in the automobile industry they were already at the 1929 peak, and have within a few days been increased beyond that.

The CHAIRMAN. You are speaking of earnings?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir, I am speaking of earnings. I will in a moment refer you to my authority.

Such have been the gains in hours and in wages, for workers against the depths of the depression through which we have passed.

You are asked for new legislation now on the ground that labor has not been fairly treated. But within 9 months, more than 20,000,000 employees have received shorter hours, higher pay, better working conditions, at the increased expense of every industry, through codes which, under the circumstances of their formation, have amounted in fact to national legislation through collective agreements between employers, employees, and the Government.

In a period, sir, of 9 months, the industries of the United States have gone through the most remarkable period of adjustment in all their history, not only in the face of the abandonment or the reorganization of established practices and customs of long standing, but in all their relations with one another.

Now, I quote:

> For the first time in the history of American industry, working conditions of labor employed in nearly all private industry has become subject to collective bargaining between representatives of industry, labor, and the Federal Government. * * * In this procedure the affiliated unions of the American Federation of Labor, independent labor organizations of all types, and even communist unions have participated. I can think of no important code which has been adopted without going through this process during which the representatives of labor sat with those of industry and made efforts to improve the labor terms of that code. * * * If again these figures are worthy of acceptance, they are the best proof we have that there is little to the charge that the codes of fair competition have failed to raise the prevailing rate of wages in the United States; that the provisions of the codes are being universally defied and violated—

As has been repeatedly said here.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know that that has been asserted very strongly.

Mr. EMERY. I think I heard some of it. I will suggest it, sir.

> If again these figures are worthy of acceptance, they are the best proof we have that there is little to the charge that the codes of fair competition have failed to raise the prevailing rate of wages in the United States; that the provisions of the codes are being universally defied and violated; that the minimum wage has, in great areas of industry, tended to become the maximum.

Senator DAVIS. Is that your own statement?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; I will now give the authority to you.

These conclusions, respecting the facts and conditions of the present situation are not mine, but represent the impartial and mature judgment of Dr. Leo Wolman, the distinguished chairman of the Labor Advisory Board, expressed within 3 weeks before the National Convention of Code Authorities, and if the Chair wishes, I will file his statement as a part of this record.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have you do so.

Mr. EMERY. All right, sir.

(The statement of Dr. Leo Wolman, referred to by the witness, is attached hereto.)

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Davis, is your question answered?

Senator DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. Meeting the misrepresentation or misunderstanding of the facts of the existing situation by the testimony of an impartial witness, let me return to you the form and substance of this pending bill. Unfortunately, its distinguished author has neither analyzed its provisions, explained its peculiar definitions, its extraordinary design, nor offered a single argument to support the permanent control by Congress of the local relations of employer and employee on farm, or in mine, or factory. What does this measure propose to do, and how does it propose to do it?

The bill creates a national labor board, ostensibly "to equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, and to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes" between them. To this end it would establish by Presidential appointment a labor board of seven members; three representing the public for 5-year terms; two, each representing employers and employees for 1-year terms. The board would exercise two kinds of authority. First, to mediate, conciliate, or arbitrate labor disputes by voluntary agreement of the parties, who agree to be bound thereby. Voluntary arbitration may now be had by agreement in any group. An increasing number of codes established under the N.R.A. are providing machinery for the adjustment of disputes within the industry through boards upon which the disputants are appropriately represented. This tendency to provide adequate methods of adjustment within each industry confined to those most familiar with the circumstances of operation, will steadily develop if encouraged and already has performed with marked success. It requires no additional legislation.

The second kind of authority, and the board's procedure in the exercise thereof——

The CHAIRMAN. You refer, of course, to the authority now vested in the Department of Labor?

Mr. EMERY. Pardon me?

The CHAIRMAN. You refer, of course, to the authority now vested in the Department of Labor?

Mr. EMERY. No; I do not, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. To what do you refer?

Mr. EMERY. I refer to the methods of adjustment which have been established in many codes by which disputes arising between any employer and employees in the industry may be adjusted, initially, in the plant, and if it fails it may go to either local or regional boards, provided in the industry, and finally to the National Board. Only when the industry had exhausted its own capacity for settlement does it escape the industry and go elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Are we to assume that the codes will continue indefinitely?

Mr. EMERY. That, of course, is in the hands of yourself and others. The methods which have been set up under the codes will have a profound and continuing influence upon the lfe of industry. No such tremendous and radical adjustment in the life of industry could take place without leaving its permanent marks upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there is a termination to the National Recovery Act?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; there is a termination.

The CHAIRMAN. A year from July? I thought you referred, perhaps, to some general law or power of conciliation in the Department of Labor.

Mr. EMERY. Of course, conciliation is quite another thing from arbitration, and both are quite a different thing from the coercive determination by any national body of the relations between employer and employee with a court behind it to enforce that determination and to compel the parties to live in a certain employment relation, whether they like it or not.

The second kind of authority, and the Board's procedure in the exercise thereof, together with the practices it is to prohibit, presents the vital issue of this measure. The bill (sec. 4) proceeds to declare that employees shall have the right to organize, join labor organizations, and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. That is already provided by section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act in far clearer language and with a criminal penalty for its violation. Its present form would invite conflicts with the already interpreted provisions of the Recovery Act, to which employer and employee have adjusted themselves under interpretations of the act's administrator. The bill then proceeds to create——

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state for the record the criminal provision in the National Recovery Act in connection with section 7 (a)?

Mr. EMERY. The criminal provision applys to every section of the act. I will have to get a copy of the act myself, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean that the general provisions apply to that section the same as to the other sections?

Mr. EMERY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. So that the employers who do not obey or respect the rights defined therein are subject to the same criminal act that they are subjected to for violation of other provisions of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; no distinction is made.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed without referring to that; we have that.

Mr. EMERY. Not only that, sir, but there are not only criminal but I should say penal provisions, because the Government is armed with the most tremendous power that has ever been given to any central authority, to enforce that act, every section of it. It possesses the power to proceed through the Trade Commission, by administrative orders, for the enforcement of the provisions of the act, which are within its jurisdiction. It is authorized to proceed through any district attorney of the United States, in the enforcement of any violation of the code. There are criminal provisions, again, in which there is a fine and imprisonment for violation of any provision of the code, and finally the President is authorized to make rules and regulations, the violation of which is in itself a misdemeanor and punishable by fine and imprisonment; so you could not very well have an act more powerfully sanctioned. There remains still the much-discussed licensing provisions, never yet availed of, which of course authorizes the President, that is gives him the alleged authority to license any industry, to determine the conditions under which it shall operate, and if the provision of the license is violated, to take away the license and drive the industry, itself, into commercial exile, or any particular employer who violates the license provision.

The CHAIRMAN. That power has never been exercised?

Mr. EMERY. It has never been exercised.

The CHAIRMAN. And expires on July 1?

Mr. EMERY. Unless you see fit to renew it.

Senator DAVIS. Are you of the opinion that the time of the National Recovery Act should be extended?

Mr. EMERY. Sir?

Senator DAVIS. Are you of the opinion that the time of the National Recovery Act should be extended?

Mr. EMERY. Well, representing as I am, many others, I would rather not give you a personal opinion, sir, at this time, because I think the time is not yet come when we can determine that fact, because that is a consideration that properly belongs to the condition with which we are confronted as the time of its termination approaches. I think there are many provisions of it, if you will permit me to say so, personally, that ought not to be renewed.

The CHAIRMAN. It is still experimental?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. It is declared by the President to be experimental legislation, and we are still in the midst of the experiment.

Senator WAGNER. Do you think that the provision suspending the antitrust laws should be continued or repealed?

Mr. EMERY. I do not think any provision should be repealed by itself, except in the relationship to other parts of the legislation. I have been for a long time, Senator, a believer in a modification of the antitrust acts; and let me say in that regard, because perhaps this is as good a time as any to call it to the attention of the committee, before I proceed to these more serious features of the bill, that I see the statement is often made, in a comparison between the labor organization's right to organize, the protection that has been given to it, and what is conceived to be the like authority that has been given to employers to organize under the codes.

Now, let me call the committee's attention to the fact that "employer's" organizations do not exist under the codes. What is provided under the code is the organization of a trade or an industry. It is brought together for the purpose of determining its competitive practices. It is in that field, as a trade organization, and not as an employer-organization, that it comes under the code. It is true that employers contact by virtue of the fact that they are thus brought together, under the executive and legislative pressure which the bill presents, but they are not there for the purpose of determining hours and wages, in agreement with their employees, even by themselves, under code provisions, because the Government is an essential part of the code, and each code contains a provision that wherever parties have failed to make an agreement with their employees, they agree, by the terms of the code, that the President may prescribe the hours and wages.

That is an agreement which they make with the President, and I believe those voluntary agreements that have been made by the employers as a part of their code, are governing provisions that assure to the working people of the United States, as long as the agreement is kept—and I believe it has been—the protection of the Government with respect to their hours and wages. These are there determined in the codes, with the Government's representative at all times participating, and no act of the code authority becomes effective until it has been approved, or is in the first instance supervised by a Government administrator. Every code that has been brought into existence has been brught into existence under 1, 2, or 3, or 5, or a half a dozen administrators, who have supervision of every feature of it, at all times, in every instance. During the hearings the representatives of labor organizations have been present to suggest or criticize or amend or to modify or oppose any provision in the codes which they think are injurious to their interests.

Never before, at any time in our history, has the organization of labor had a more complete opportunity to present its points of view and be represented by its own chosen leaders, in every department of the administration of the Government, to see that their views and wishes receive that consideration which is always given to those who occupy places of political importance in the administration of the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. That is only, though, in relationship to hours of labor and minimum wages, isn't it?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; it applies to conditions of employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the evidence before us here is that these codes do not deal with the rate of wages in industry, other than the minimum wage rate.

Mr. EMERY. No, the code——

The CHAIRMAN. So that that is understood.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; the code has endeavored to place a base line, below which they may not fall.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; so these representatives of the employees, who appeared before the committee, state that the power of collective bargaining cannot be freely exercised with their employers, which is permitted under the codes, if the local unit, the local labor union, is dominated by the employers. You are familiar, of course, with that contention?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I am afraid we are diverting you from your general criticism of the bill. You may proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; I will. The bill proceeds to create a new offense (sec. 5) described as an "unfair labor practice." The bill comprehends a series of acts, upon which the author of the measure undertakes to rest congressional authority, by indicating that they may lead, or tend to lead to a labor dispute, and I quote, "that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce." (Sec. 205 (a).) It will thus be observed that the power of Congress is hung upon a hypothetical conjecture, resting in the unrestrained imagination of the administrative authority, surmising the relationship between a local complaint and its probable influence upon national intercourse.

Now, what is an "unfair labor practice"? It is defined in six paragraphs, each of which is an act by an employer, but, under no circumstances, by an employee, which is declared unlawful. At this point, Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, I should like to insert section 5, which defines the unfair labor practices, for the information of the committee, in connection with the statement which I may make. It will save me from repeating them here, and will enable you to determine whether or not any statement I make with reference to them is accurate.

The CHAIRMAN. Your request is granted. Section 5 will be inserted in the record, in connection with your remarks.

SEC. 5. It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer, or anyone acting in his interest, directly or indirectly—

(1) To attempt, by interference, influence, restraint, favor, coercion, or lockout, or by any other means, to impair the right of employees guaranteed in section 4.

(2) To refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees, or to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

(3) To initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, bylaws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization.

(4) To contribute financial or other material support to any labor organization, by compensating anyone for services performed in behalf of any labor organization, or by any other means whatsoever.

(5) To fail to notify employees in accordance with the provisions of section 304 (b).

(6) To engage in any discriminatory practice as to wage or hour differentials, advancement, demotion, hire, tenure of employment, reinstatement, or any other condition of employment, which encourages membership or nonmembership in any labor organization: Provided, That where a contract or agreement of any kind is or shall be in force between an employer and a group of employees, the provisions of such contract or agreement regarding conditions of employment shall not, because of anything contained in this paragraph, compel an employer to observe similar conditions of employment in his relations with all his employees: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall preclude an employer and a labor organization from agreeing that a person seeking employment shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join such labor organization, if no attempt is made to influence such labor organization by any unfair labor practice, if such labor organization is composed of at least a majority of such employers' employees, and if the said agreement does not cover a period in excess of one year.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you are going to discuss, I understand, the 6 unfair labor practices?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That are defined in section 5?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And which employers are forbidden, under penalty, to perform or practice?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. And let me remark, in passing, for the information of the committee, that the Senator's bill has been introduced, with slight modification, in the House, by the distinguished chairman of the House Labor Committee, with this essential difference that what the Senator has made "unlawful" in his bill, the House bill makes criminal.

Senator WAGNER. Well, I am mild, then.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; your nature is. In substance, an "unfair labor practice" is any act of the employer which not merely impairs the employees' right of organization or collective bargaining, by interference, restraint, or coercion, but by refusing to recognize or deal with a representative of the employee; the Labor Board possessing the power to determine at all times who that representative is. It is unlawful for the employer to refuse to recognize or deal with such representative for any reason. There is no exception made in subparagraph 2 of section 5. The offense is "to refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees", or to "fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment."

It is equally an offense, I have said, for an employer to fail to exert every reasonable effort to secure working agreements through such representative; and of the reasonableness of his effort, this Board, or someone designated for that purpose—for the Board operates through any individual it selects, anywhere; there is no assurance that he will ever be heard by the Board, or a member of it; he may be heard by its examiner, or by anyone whom it designates, in any part of the United States or its possessions—and I say, of the reasonableness of his acts, this Board is the sole judge. It is equally unlawful for the employer to either "initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence" the form or policy of any labor organization. The labor organization may not keep its contract. It may demonstrate bad leadership. It may commit violence. It may be communistic in philosophy and action. Any attempt by an employer to influence a change in its form or policy, or initiate reform, or suggest or offer to assist in forming a different organization, or submit a plan for their joint relationship, is a plain offense under this act.

Senator WAGNER. You think that ought to be permitted, Mr. Emery?

Mr. EMERY. Sir?

Senator WAGNER. You think that ought to be permitted?

Mr. EMERY. Why, certainly.

Senator WAGNER. You think an employer ought to submit plans of organization to the workers?

Mr. EMERY. Why, certainly. Why not initiate one?

Senator WAGNER. Well, I just wanted your views about it.

Mr. EMERY. I want to suggest to the chairman and to the gentlemen of the committee as a plain matter of common sense, for the consideration of men of affairs, how can there be bargaining between two individuals or two groups, large or small, if either party is to be forbidden to initiate a suggestion, suggest a plan, or offer a method of intercourse, in one of the most delicate and important of the relations of life? Think of applying that to the other major relations of life, between landlord and tenant, or between borrower and lender.

Senator WAGNER. This has to do with organizing the particular union.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. I am not speaking——

Mr. EMERY. It has to do with organizing the employment relation between the parties.

Senator WAGNER. You think the employer ought to be permitted to organize the labor union?

Mr. EMERY. I did not say he ought to be permitted to organize the labor union. I said he ought to be permitted at all times to initiate a proposal, and I say to this committee—and I invite their examination—that there are in existence in the United States today, not one but many plans of relationship between employer and employee, that have been in existence, some since the beginning of the century, initiated by the employer and perfected by the employee.

Senator BORAH. How do you draw the line between initiation and coercion?

Mr. EMERY. Sir?

Senator BORAH. How do you draw the line? Where would you stop? You say you ought to be permitted to initiate; and how far should the company be permitted to go, to impose its plans?

Mr. EMERY. Well, Senator, it seems to me that whenever the employer undertakes to corrupt the will or override the will or dominate the free opinion of the employee, except by argument or reasoning, then he may be justly charged with undertaking to improperly or unduly influence him. That, I think, is the view which the Supreme Court has taken in the case of Railway Clerks Union v. The Texas & New Orleans Railroad, in the two hundred and eighty one United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Borah, have you finished?

Senator BORAH. I wanted to ask one further question.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, Senator?

Senator BORAH. That is a general statement, but what expression would you put in the law, to restrain an employer from imposing the will of the employer upon the organization? How would you draw that line? If you permit them to initiate it, to start it, then where will you have them cease?

Mr. EMERY. Well, I cannot see, Senator, I confess, practically, how a man can make a suggestion to another—an offer, if you please—unless he is permitted to formulate the character of the offer.

Now, employment relations of a right kind are just as important to the employer as they are to the employee. Good relations are the lubricant upon which their joint work moves forward. A plant with bad employment relations is a bad plant. It will never succeed. That is as well recognized among employers, as far as I know them, in these United States, as any other factor or circumstance of their operation.

Senator BORAH. But what I am interested in is against the company imposing their will in the way of organization, upon the employee.

Mr. EMERY. I think that is a plain matter of evidence. I don't know the point at which you can shade it off. One might as well say, on the other hand, what about the coercion by other groups upon the employer? Is it necessary to shade that, equally?

Senator BORAH. Well, go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. But what I want to make clear right at this point—and that is only one phase of it—we are now splitting the metaphysic hair "twixt north and northwest" side, over the delicate meaning of words that often confuse both the minds of men and those of courts; I am willing to discuss the real substance of this thing, I do not conceive, Senator, and I am sure in your wide experience that you would find it difficult to conceive, a relationship between employer and employee, in which one party cannot initiate a suggestion or proposal to the other; because, mind you, you are not dealing here—and I think this is a very important consideration—merely with the employer who deals with thousands of men; and, let me say, when we are talking about employers of thousands, those for whom I have the honor to speak include small employers, intermediate employers, large employers, representing every gradation from small shops to very large ones; but particularly the rather middle class manufacturers of the United States; for this bill applies its terms to every employer of one or more persons.

Literally construed, it creates a Federal jurisdiction over a dispute between a woman and her two domestic servants. It has been said again and again, here, that of course one employee is helpless, as one of ten thousand, to deal with a gigantic corporation which employs him. That is true. He accepts the conditions of employment which he there finds, and it is in the interest of the corporation to make those as fair and equitable as possible, in order to retain the most important asset it has—the good will of its men. On the other hand, what is the position of a single employer, employing 25 or 30 men, in the presence of a powerful union, with thousands of members? He is just as helpless in dealing with them as is the other. So that when one begins to consider the weakness of bargaining power, as an economic fact, he will see it in both sides, in both camps. It is a very interesting circumstance, that deserves your careful consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, isn't this influence that you spoke of restricted and limited? That influence can only be exercised in regard to formation, constitution, bylaws, and other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization? It seems to me it is easy to define and to distinguish between fair and legitimate influence and improper influence.

Mr. EMERY. Yes. There are two things, Senator, to begin with—to initiate or to participate. Now, I cannot conceive anything more important in employment than an employer's participating in the kind of organization with which he deals. I am not undertaking to say that he participates in an endeavor to form the organization, to fashion it. In other words, to create such an organization that he sits on opposite sides of the table, as the Senator from New York says, with himself.

Senator BORAH. Well, you will agree that the corporation should not be permitted to impose its theory of a union on the men?

Mr. EMERY. As against his desire to organize himself in a different way?

Senator BORAH. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Well, that is all I am seeking.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. And if other words will reach that objective better, there is no pride of words in this suggestion.

Mr. EMERY. I know. I am discussing the bill.

Senator WAGNER. If we have a common objective, we ought to be able to find words with which to agree.

Mr. EMERY. Of course, we may have a common objective, Senator, without being able to agree upon the instrumentality that can carry it out.

Senator WAGNER. What prompted the adoption of these words is because of the experience with the Railway Labor Act.

Mr. EMERY. Oh, I shall come to the Railway Act, in a moment.

Senator WAGNER. Will you?

Mr. EMERY. And I shall proceed, in a most particular way, to discuss it.

Senator WALCOTT. Before we leave this, Mr. Emery, you would say, then, on the whole, that some of these provisions tended to irritate and defeat the purposes at which we are aiming?

Mr. EMERY. I say that they would outlaw and prohibit the natural and normal intercourse between employer and employee, essential to the practical and successful operation of their mutual agreements in the establishment of their employment relations.

Senator WALCOTT. Well, then, if that is true, then it injures labor as much as it does the employers?

Mr. EMERY. I think so, as we say, here—I am making to you today a general statement. You will have much particular testimony given to you, out of the experience of men who can speak with authority, both employers and employees, in dealing with the various forms of labor organizations. I know this committee would be the last to seek to injure the free establishment of relations that are mutually satisfactory to employer and employee. I know you will recognize that it is a most fundamental right, to determine the character of their mutual relationship between themselves, and not to have somebody else do it for them, whether it is an employer on the one hand, or a powerful organization of labor that undertakes to dominate either the men or the management in the determination of the kind of relations that they want.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Emery, just one more question, and then I won't interrupt again unless you are willing to be interrupted. Do you believe that when an organization of this kind is formed, that the employers' consent ought to be required before the constitution and bylaws are changed?

Mr. EMERY. Pardon me, what did you say about "constitution" of what kind, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Union constitution.

Senator WAGNER. You say it is for the benefit of the workers to have the employer participate, initiate, and participate in the organization of the labor union; to participate in the making of its rules and its constitution, and all that sort of thing; that that idea rather promotes friendly relationships, rather than to irritate them. After that has been done, it is equally——

Mr. EMERY. If you will permit me, before you depart from that assumption, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. May I be permitted slightly to correct it?

Senator WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. EMERY. I said that I thought the participation of an employer in the determination of the character of his agreement with his employee, ought not to be outlawed.

Senator WAGNER. Well, we are not outlawing it.

Mr. EMERY. No.

Senator WAGNER. We are encouraging that.

Mr. EMERY. Oh, on the contrary, you are saying that if he undertakes to participate with a group of his employees, in determining the character of their relations, he immediately commits an offense.

Senator WAGNER. No; no. We are talking about the organization of a labor union, or a labor organization.

Mr. EMERY. Oh, I see.

Senator WAGNER. It is that sort of organization that you say the employer ought to be permitted to participate in?

Mr. EMERY. Oh, I did not say that. I said, as far as any labor organization is concerned, they can form it as they please, by themselves, entirely absent and apart from their employer; but, if their employer offers to deal with them, in any particular form of relationship, or offers to make a suggestion to them with respect to their organization, whatever kind of an organization it is, is that an offense of such a nature that it ought to be made unlawful?

Senator WAGNER. Well, all right, supposing that is permitted; then, will you go so far as to say that after that is once formed, the constitution and the bylaws, that the employer's consent ought to be required before that organization can be modified in any way?

Mr. EMERY. It depends on the character of their agreement.

Senator WAGNER. Well——

Mr. EMERY. If the two have entered into an agreement that establishes a form of relationship between them, then it seems to me that either one party or the other would certainly counsel, before undertaking to change the agreement, if we assume it to be an agreement.

Senator WAGNER. We are not talking about the same thing, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. Well, I am afraid I am not, then, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. I am not talking about an agreement entered into between the employers and the employees. I am talking now about employee's organization.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, all right.

Senator WAGNER. Which is their own thing, isn't it?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Now, you say that there ought not to be any prohibition against the employer either initiating such an organization or participating in its formation. Now, let us talk an agreement; we are talking about the organization.

Mr. EMERY. With the consent of the employees?

Senator WAGNER. Now, that having been formed and organized——

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. This labor organization; you then think, too, that it is a proper provision to adopt, which prohibits the change of that constitution or bylaw of this labor organization, unless the employer consents to it?

Mr. EMERY. Of course, if you are talking about a labor organization that has formed itself, and desires to make any changes in its organization or constitution or bylaws, why, that is its own business, of course; it is free to do that without any interference by anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to me you are both fundamentally in agreement. I think it is only a different language necessary to take care of that.

Mr. EMERY. I think unfortunately, we are talking about two different forms of organization, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you are fundamentally in agreement, though. What you are criticizing is that this language is so broad that it may lead to the punishment of the employer for things that we all agree are legitimate and proper for an employer to engage in.

Mr. EMERY. Yes; precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. So it is a question of restriction in the language.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. So, let us proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. I say that, as this is written, any attempt by an employer to influence a change in its form or philosophy, or initiate reform or suggest or offer to assist in forming a different organization, or to submit a plan for their joint relationship, is a plain offense.

Any favors to an employee, that may construed by this board into an attempt to influence the form, activity, or policy of the employee's organization, is equally illegal; and so, too, is any contribution to the support of any labor organization, although a labor organization, by definition, here, may assume any form, for mutual aid or protection.

Now, I want the committee to remember, and I know they will, with the distinguished lawyers on it——

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think any employee will object to a contribution for a mutual aid and protection.

Mr. EMERY. Oh, but the labor board will. My! The employer who did that would commit a plain offense, here, if it can be construed to influence—and I do not know, of course, what may be in the administrative mind, after this measure is formed. Because, how power may be used is something no man can prophesy. All the legislative body can do is determine the kind of power it will delegate, and the form in which it will give it.

The CHAIRMAN. You are very properly, Mr. Emery, pointing out the need of exact and clear language in setting up this relationship, that is attempted under this bill.

Mr. EMERY. More than that, Mr. Chairman, I want, in all I am saying, to ask the committee to remember that while I am speaking of particular features of the bill, it is the bill as a whole that must always be considered, because, as an act of legislation, all its parts dovetail together, and the one influences and powerfully affects the operation of another part.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. Moreover, any practice that may be construed as being discriminatory as a circumstance or condition of employment which encourages membership or nonmembership in any labor organization, and that means any kind of an association for the purpose of dealing with the employer, is likewise prohibitive. There are many forms of employment relationship developed since the beginning of the factory operating today not only without complaint, but to the demonstrated satisfaction of employer and employee, but no matter how old they may be, or agreeable to the parties they are, if the employer initiated or participated in setting them up, they are not only abrogated by this bill, but the employer must immediately so notify his employees, and they are destroyed.

The CHAIRMAN. Any doubt about that?

Senator BORAH. State that again, please.

Mr. EMERY. I say that no matter how old a form of employee relationship now existing in any particular plant between the employer and employee or in any industry may be, no matter how old it may be, no matter how agreeable to the parties, if the employer initiated that plan, or participated in setting it up, the plan is not only abrogated, but the employer must immediately so notify his employees, and the plan is destroyed. Not to do so is an unlawful act. That is provided by section 304 of the bill, section (b):

> Any term of a contract or agreement of any kind which conflicts with the provisions of this act, is hereby abrogated, and every employer who is a party to such contract or agreement shall immediately so notify his employees by appropriate act.

Now, under section 5, paragraph 3, to initiate or participate in any labor organization or in its formation is an unfair labor practice, so that any old plans, any systems of employment relationship, which are in existence in which the employer participated or which he influenced are all outlawed by that provision right now.

Senator WAGNER. I think there is raised there a more serious question of constitutional law.

Mr. EMERY. Yes; certainly. I will discuss those legal questions and constututional questions, Senator, separately, with your kind indulgence.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been suggested by some witnesses, witnesses who are friendly to the bill, who have appeared before the committee that that section be eliminated from the bill.

Senator WAGNER. Including the author.

The CHAIRMAN. I am referring to section 304 (b). I did not know you had agreed to the elimination, Senator, but I think others have.

Senator DAVIS. I think the committee is unanimous.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. The more closely these provisions are scrutinized, the more clear the operating effect becomes. They are so designed as to make it impossible for an employer and an employee to establish, administer, or maintain a plant organization, although it is the right and desire of each group to do so. Not only may they not form genuine employee representation plans in plant terms for the future, but it is the plain purpose of this measure to destroy every one, however old, however successful, however satisfactory, now in existence. The inevitable result, with the aid of the law, is to make only one form of employee relationship legal—that conducted with an outside labor organization into which the employee, by the force of administrative decision, is to be gradually compelled, until finally the employer is forced into making it a condition of employment by agreement with the external organization operating with the aid of the Labor Board, to deal with none but its members.

This condition becomes clearer as one examines the definitions of the bill. An "employer" is not someone employing many, as proponents intimate by constantly referring to "one man among a thousand" dealing with a corporation; the bill defines as an employer anyone "employing one or more persons", except National, State, or local government, those subject to the Railway Act or a labor organization. An "employee" is not only one who works for another, but may be one who does not work for another. For the term does not include anyone who replaces a striking employee but does include every former employee who has quit because of a current labor dispute or an unfair labor practice.

You will observe, therefore, that construed as written, the bill covers every farmer, every housewife with a servant, every storekeeper, merchant, contractor, mine operator or manufacturer, and many others who are employers here. Let us examine the powers of the Labor Board and then we will perceive the full effect of these definitions.

How does it operate? Whenever any of the board's members, any local body it may create, or anybody whom it may designate, anywhere, within American territory, has reason to believe from information obtained "from any source whatever" that an employer has committed an "unfair labor practice", a complaint, general in its nature, may be mailed or telegraphed to him, or if the employer is a corporation, service may be obtained by handing a copy to one of its directors, anywhere. Upon such a summons, as the bill reads, a farmer in Iowa, a merchant in New Orleans, or a manufacturer in New York, may be required to appear anywhere in the United States for a hearing on 24 hours' notice, and produce books, records, and documents not before the board but before anyone it designates to examine him.

The general complaint he has received may be amended by the Board or anybody it designates, not only during the hearing, but up to the time the Board issues an order, and after the subject of the complaint has been heard, for the original complaint in no way limits the scope of the Board's inquiry. He can be charged with an offense general in its nature, but he can be examined on anything else that interests the Board when he appears before it. He may have the Board's aid in securing testimony and although other persons may be allowed to appear and present testimony, they are not bound by the proceedings. If they are labor organizations or their agents, they cannot, of course, be examined with respect to "unfair practices" which they are incapable of committing, for under this measure no one can be "unfair" but an employer. The Board may not only issue an order in the light of the complaint, it may do many more things, it may assess and require the employer to pay damages for which no rule is established; require the reinstatement of employees, or require any act which in its opinion achieves substantial justice, whatever that may be. The Board determines that. If that be due process of law, God save us.

The Board is not bound by the rules of evidence as are courts of law or equity, and that is so stated, but the court which reviews the Board's order is bound by the findings of fact of the Board which itself has no rule of evidence and may therefore admit what pleases its discretion.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Emery, may I ask a question there?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. What would you provide in a case—and these are the majority of cases that have come under our jurisdiction in the Labor Board—where employers after the employees organize, select representatives to bargain collectively with the employer upon wages, hours, and other conditions of employment, the employer takes the deliberate stand, "I will not deal with you; I will not deal with any labor organization of any kind; the only way I will deal is with each individual, and I will prescribe the terms"?

Now, we have given under the National Recovery Act the rights of labor to organize and collectively bargain on the theory that that is equality of bargaining power. Now, what would you do when the employer deliberately, therefore inviting turmoil and strife, and all these things, and which represents 70 percent of our cases, I would say, says, "No, I will not deal with you; I will not deal with any organization of workers"? What would you do? Should the Government sit by and not at least see that the workers' rights are recognized?

Mr. EMERY. Just precisely what has that to do, Senator, with the statement I have just made with respect to the fact that the Board is entirely free from rules of evidence?

Senator WAGNER. You say that they are given the authority to hear a complaint and summon witnesses and go into this question as to whether the law has been violated, whether the worker has been deprived of his rights, and you say that is an extraordinary power; that is the power we give to other administrative bodies like the Federal Trade Commission, and all these other bodies.

Mr. EMERY. We will see in a moment whether you do or not.

Senator WAGNER. Should the Government stand prostrate before a situation of that kind, or should they intervene and see that justice is done?

Mr. EMERY. Assuming, Senator, from your question that you are presented with a deliberate violation of the law by one who appears before you, and whom you have the right to examine, I should say that your duty is very plain, and it is to proceed to a criminal prosecution of the person who has done the act.

Senator WAGNER. Now, there, we get right to the point.

Mr. EMERY. Under the National Recovery Act, you mean?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. Now, we get right to the point. That has been the difficulty with section 7 (a). The employer has contended, and I am sorry he has, because it has caused a great deal of the irritations—you may not agree with me——

Mr. EMERY. I think a great many things have caused the irritations, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. He has contended that section 7 (2) says: "Yes, you may bargain collectively, but I, the employer, do not have to bargain with you unless I feel like it."

So, there is a one-sided right given, and that has been the actual contention before us, that there is nothing in that section 7 (a) which says that I must collectively bargain with you; it simply says the laborers may organize for the purpose of collectively bargaining.

Therefore, they have said, "Come in, gentlemen; sit down; what have you got to say?"

They present their grievances, and then they say, "Good-bye", and that is all there is to it, and nothing further happens, and that has caused the difficulties.

Do you think this bill is going to irritate, because we are trying to eliminate these irritations? Now, I am going to ask you in a case like that, and the attorneys for the employers have made that contention before us, time and time again, that there is no obligation in this act to collectively bargain, and that is the suggestion that has been made—we have decided, our Board has decided, that they are required to use every reasonable means to bargain, and the employer says, "You haven't any right to render any such decision; there is nothing in 7 (a) which gives such right."

Now, what we are trying to do is to make that a reality, and I should think that the enlightened employer would help in bringing about some legislation that will make that a reality, rather than to continue this confused situation, unless the employer wants that advantage, having gotten everything else. You will remember that I fought for the Recovery Act, and helped to draft it, and there were extraordinary rights given to the employer under that act, which I fought for and defended. Now, we ought to balance the thing up by giving the worker equal rights, and that is all there is to this thing, and if you will suggest some way that that situation can be brought out and with other language, I think you ought to suggest it.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, we will be pleased to have your reply.

Mr. EMERY. Of course, the Senator has presented me with such a variety of questions that I am somewhat embarrassed in endeavoring to answer each one first.

Senator WAGNER. As a matter of fact, you know of the situation; you are the attorney for the employers, and you know the situation.

Mr. EMERY. I know the situation that has arisen in your Labor Board, Senator, and I want to say, with the utmost respect for you personally, that I think it is an easily demonstrable fact that your Board has lost the confidence of the employers of the country because it has displayed time and again marked bias. Not only that, but because it has usurped authority which it did not get, and has undertaken continuously to exercise a power given to it for one very definite purpose, for a great many others which were not found in the Executive order under which it operated.

Now, let me say just in that connection—I refer now to the Board, and you know I say this with the utmost respect for you, because I think this is one of the causes of the serious irritation that has developed in relations—the President under the Recovery Act was authorized to establish such agencies and appoint such persons and officers as were in his discretion necessary to the effective operation of the act. The president appointed the Labor Board on the 5th day of August 1933. He appointed it for a very definite purpose. The order which was issued on that date said:

> The Board will consider, adjust, and settle differences and controversies that may arise through differing interpretations of the President's reemployment agreement, and will act with all possible dispatch in making known their findings" (Release No. 195, National Recovery Administration).

And so forth.

Now, the President's reemployment agreement——

Senator WAGNER. There was another order issued, you know that?

Mr. EMERY. I beg your pardon, but I am talking about the only order that was in existence between the 5th of August and the 16th of December; and between the 5th of August and the 16th of December your Board issued dozens of requests, summonses, and complaints, and required people to come from all parts of the country at great expense and loss of time on all sorts of complaints, many of which were justified and some were not. I am not undertaking to pass on that. That was your function, sir.

But your major difficulties arose from the fact that as codes were established, and industries were organized under the codes, the President, by the reemployment agreement in very express language, and I have it before me, declared that the reemployment agreement should never under any circumstances attach to any industry as its code was approved.

Now, the Labor Board's chief conflicts, those with whom it has asserted continuously have been most contumacious violators, are those who are operating under codes not subject to the reemployment agreement and whom the board undertook to exercise authority over, when it possessed none except the authority under the Executive order of August 5, between that date and December 16, which applied only to the interpretation or to disputes arising under the President's reemployment agreement.

I can take six or seven labor cases, over which you have declared your jurisdiction, employers and employees operating under codes, where you have asserted your right to determine their respective rights, to summon them into your presence, to issue orders, and to denounce them publicly as violators of the law, when they obeyed the law and you disobeyed it because you did not have the authority that you asserted to exercise.

Senator WAGNER. Well, of course, you are saying something which has no basis of fact, because I speak from experience, and you are speaking only from hearsay.

Mr. EMERY. I am talking from the President's order, and I ask to put it in the record at this time.

Senator WAGNER. Then you ought to put in the later order.

Mr. EMERY. I will put in all the orders, if you will pardon me.

The CHAIRMAN. They may be put in.

Mr. EMERY. I will put in the order of August 5, the order of December 16, and the order of February 1, and the later order; those four orders constitute all the authority your Board has, do they not, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. They may go in the record.

(The four orders just referred to by Mr. Emery are to be included in the record. They are not attached to the transcript.)

Mr. EMERY. Do you have any other Executive order between August 5 and December 16?

Senator WAGNER. No.

Mr. EMERY. That is all the authority you had?

Senator WAGNER. Let me tell you, I do not want to have go unchallenged the statement you are making, because it is very unfair to everybody who spent his time in order to avert the serious strikes which were imminent. Every member of that Labor Board worked without compensation, and he devoted his nights to the bringing about of peace in industry and averting these strikes, and we invited both employer and employee before us, and though you might have advised them otherwise, none of them, with the exception of one or two, ever challenged the jurisdiction of the Board. The exceptional case which you referred to received public attention, but in a great majority of cases, I will say for the employers they accepted our offers of mediation, and we adjusted their differences as the result of an agreement with the parties.

There are 2 or 3 cases, perhaps 4, of large employers who defied what we asked to be done, and we have always stated what we ordered to be done was, we thought, in the public interest, because they refused to bargain collectively with the representatives chosen by the employees. Of course, in those particular cases where there was a defiance of section 7 (a), naturally, objection was made to the decision.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't think the committee desires to go into the field of dispute, as to whether the Labor Board overstepped its prerogatives and powers or not. That is not in criticism of your statement, Mr. Emery, because perhaps the statement made by you was invited. I suggest that you proceed with the discussion of this bill.

Mr. EMERY. Let me only say, Mr. Chairman, and I will not renew the discussion, I have not the slightest desire of reflecting on the personnel of the Board, and I have only in response to the inquiry necessarily discussed the nature of the public authority exercised by the body.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand your point to be simply this, that after the codes were signed, in which was defined the method of settling disputes, the Labor Board lost its authority to settle these disputes, because the codes themselves arranged for the method of settling. Senator Wagner disputes that, but we do not want to try to settle that now.

Senator WAGNER. I must answer that. Mr. Emery is entirely mistaken. In any case where the code set up an authority to deal with labor disputes, the moment a complaint came to our board it was transmitted to that particular authority in every instance; not only that, but in some cases the workers complained because they preferred to have us deal with it. In the case of the bituminous coal situation, just recently, we received a complaint which we referred to the code authority where there is a Board set up with a representative of labor and industry for the purpose of settling labor disputes. But, of course, as you know, in many of these industries, there isn't any representative of labor on it at all, and they have no authority in the code to deal with labor disputes as such.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, let us get back to this bill, now. Give us some more evidence against its provisions.

Mr. EMERY. I don't want the committee to misunderstand in the least what that statement of mine was. It is simply that between August 5 and the Executive order of December 16, there was no authority for the Board to exercise anything but authority over the interpretations of the President's Reemployment Agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. We have that in the record.

Mr. EMERY. I have said that the Board proposed in this bill is not bound by the rules of evidence as are the courts of law or equity, but the court which reviews the Board's order is bound by the findings of fact of the Board which itself has no rule of evidence, and may, therefore, admit what pleases its discretion. I am not disposed to dispute the liberal granting of the power to take evidence by an administrative body, but I think we will find in a moment by examining other bodies, like the Federal Trade Commission, the limitations which they have carefully placed upon themselves or which have been placed there by law.

The district courts of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, are given jurisdiction to enforce by injunction the Board's orders and restrain any unfair labor practice. I want you to note that that authority is given to the district courts of the United States and also to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, so this Board may resort to either; that is, either the district in which the person complained of happens to reside, or it may force him to come into the District of Columbia, no matter where he may live.

Observing that the Board intends to govern by injunction, the author of the bill has assured organized labor it need not have any anxiety since injunctions will be issued only against employers, and in no instance against any unfair practice by themselves. I know I do not misstate the Senator there. That is from his radio address.

While limited court review is provided on appeal from an order of the Board with respect to complaints described, the appeal itself does not operate to stay the Board's order. It is only after the order has been granted by the court on an appeal for review that there is any stay in the proceeding of the Board itself.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Emery, if we amend the act as I suggested, it should be amended so that any intimidation, coercion, or anything of that kind, is an improper labor practice——

Mr. EMERY. "Unfair labor practice."

Senator WAGNER. "Unfair labor practice," from whatever source it may come, then this power would go to labor organizations, too, would it not, the power to restrain coercion, intimidation, or these other unfair practices? With that amendment, of course, your criticism——

Mr. EMERY. It would be quite necessary, if you were going to use the equity power to restrain, improper practices to amend the act of 1932, which recently passed.

Senator WAGNER. Which I recently passed? Oh, you mean the Norris-LaGuardia Act?

Mr. EMERY. I meant the Senate—the Congress, rather.

Senator WAGNER. I beg your pardon.

Mr. EMERY. While limited court review is provided on appeal from an order of the Board with respect to complaints described, the appeal itself does not operate to stay the Board's order. Moreover, and this is very important, it is given additional powers to determine in any dispute (sec. 207) who are the representatives of employees. To this end it may conduct any investigation to determine who they are, including the taking of a secret ballot of employees. It may even go so far as to determine the unit in any plant upon which participation in elections may take place. It is given—observe this—clear authority to define who are agents, a question of law, and to do it finally without judicial review, a plainly forbidden practice by many decisions.

Section 207 is not made the subject of judicial review, and section 207 is the section which authorizes the Labor Board to determine who are the representatives of employees, that is, who are agents. That, of course, is not only a question of fact, but is also a question of law, the determination of an agent, and that is not subject to review.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, Mr. Emery, any question of fact found by the Federal Trade Commission is also conclusive upon the courts, is it not?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; only one supported by what the court declares to be evidence, and the court has said in the case of Gratz v. Federal Trade Commission (253 U.S.), that the court reserves the right to review both the facts and the law as found by the Federal Trade Commission. That that is a matter for judicial decision.

Senator WAGNER. To ascertain whether the facts found have any evidence to support them.

Mr. EMERY. You find out, first of all, whether there are questions of fact and law, not only whether they have facts to support them, but whether they are real evidence.

Senator WAGNER. Very well.

Mr. EMERY. Suppose an administrative body accepts as evidence a copy of a letter alleged to be an original, suppose it accepts secondary tertiary, or quarternary evidence, which it may do, without any control by the rules of evidence, will not the court examine that to determine whether a man has been the victim of a finding of fact?

Senator WAGNER. Of course, you have given the argument that has always been made against any of these laws being enacted. For instance, our public-service commissions throughout the country have provisions in the law that the court reviews the law, but the findings of the public-service commissions are final. Of course, it is always a question of law, as to whether there is any evidence to sustain findings of fact.

Mr. EMERY. Sure, sure.

Senator WAGNER. So that you have got that review, always, as to whether facts are there to support the conclusion; and the argument which you made has been made whenever this proposal has been offered, and it has been enacted in spite of the position of your philosophy, in all the States of the Union.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, and if you will permit me, Senator——

Senator WAGNER. And if there is any apprehension about it, I am quite willing to have that changed, so the court may review the facts and the law, because it does not matter at all. It was, in my opinion, of proper administration, which has been accepted now after years of experience, in all of our legislative acts. I am willing to go back to the old days, on this particular question, because I have absolute confidence in the courts of our country, in order to meet this position which I know would exist, no matter what I said in the act; but I am willing now to change the law so that you may be relieved of any apprehension, and review the facts and the law.

Mr. EMERY. Well, I hope the Senator will be equally willing to find a legal basis for it.

Senator WAGNER. Well, you thought that my employment exchange bill was unconstitutional. Constitutionality has been your great weapon. It has been a great weapon for you, in all these cases, but unfortunately Congress has not always accepted your views. You remember your intense and fervent argument against the constitutionality of the employment exchange bill?

Mr. EMERY. Employment exchange?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. Is your memory faulty?

Mr. EMERY. Oh, I beg your pardon, I did not identify the thing you spoke of by the name you gave it.

Senator WAGNER. Well, what would you call it?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Employment exchange bill?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; yes, sir; very well.

Senator WAGNER. And yet the C.W.A. could not have been done, and I have Mr. Hopkinson's word for it, it could not have been done without the Employment Exchange Act.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. Which the President signed in spite of that.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sure you have not forgotten the argument. You may have forgotten the fervor with which you presented your argument.

Mr. EMERY. Oh, yes, indeed. I might have even forgotten the Senator's argument.

Senator WAGNER. I notice Senator Walsh was chairman of the committee.

Mr. EMERY. So, of course, Mr. Chairman, we are placed in the position of discussing what the Senator proposes, not what he now reforms. We are faced with his proposal, and we take it as he wrote it.

Senator WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. EMERY. Assuming he meant what he said.

Senator WAGNER. Certainly, but I want to recognize the effectiveness of your criticism.

Mr. EMERY. Yes?

Senator WAGNER. That I am accepting some of the suggestions you make.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we will get to the constitutional defense later, Mr. Emery, won't we?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, and I trust the Senator will show as much friendship for the Constitution as I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. I make it plain that section 207 provided for these very tremendous powers, without any review of the law, which the Senator says he is perfectly willing to give, and I am sure, if the Senator keeps on reforming his bill, we will probably get to the point where he will be willing to strike out the title.

Senator WAGNER. That is what you would like to see.

Mr. EMERY. Such, in bare outline, are the proposals contained in this legislation. Its author, without undertaking to vindicate its authority, asserts, as have several witnesses before you, that it parallels the Railway Labor Disputes Act and the statute establishing the Federal Trade Commission.

A brief comparison with the former—that is, the Railway Labor Disputes Act—shows that it has no likeness whatever in either terms or philosophy. The Railway Labor Disputes Act of May 20, 1926, was agreed legislation between the railroads and their employees. It makes it the duty of both management and men to avoid by agreement any interruption of commerce and to settle their disputes by voluntary negotiation. It is a duty placed equally upon both, just as the Interstate Commerce Act places upon employer and employee the equal duty of performing their functions under it. It prohibits both employer or employees from interfering, influencing, or coercing the other in self-organization or designation of representatives. This bill recognizes only one form of coercion, and provides for only one form of coercion. The Railway Labor Disputes Act declares that nothing in the act shall be construed—and I quote—

> To prohibit an individual carrier and its employees from agreeing upon the settlement of disputes through such machinery of contract and adjustment as they may mutually establish.

That is, it recognizes the established employee relation plans existing among the carriers over long periods of years, on a great scale, by which thousands of employees, union and nonunion, through their selected representatives, discuss and settle and adjust all the various matters at issue between them. The employer participates and did participate; in many cases originated the organization of the plans that there exist. They were perfected in conference. So the Railway Labor Act not only recognizes but encourages and places on a firm foundation the very kind of organization which the bill before you would destroy.

Senator WAGNER. Have you got the practices in the act, as they are enumerated—the unfair practices?

Mr. EMERY. In what act, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. Railway Labor Act.

Mr. EMERY. I am speaking of the Railway Labor Dispute Act of 1926, May 20.

Senator WAGNER. Well, I will get it later.

Mr. EMERY. Is not that the one you referred to.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. The one that the witnesses referred to.

Senator WAGNER. Are there some practices referred to there?

Mr. EMERY. There are none, sir. The Railway Labor Dispute Act of May 20, partly, in section 3, subparagraph K, is the one from which I have just quoted.

Senator WAGNER. Is there anything in the act which created the coordinator last year?

Mr. EMERY. Your Railway Coordination Act?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. Well, I am discussing the disputes act, just now; if you will let me finish it, I will go to that.

Senator WAGNER. Do you remember whether there is or not?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. There is—I think I have in mind what you refer to, and I will refer to that.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. The bill before you recognizes——

Senator DAVIS. Mr. Emery, would you support a plan similar to the Railway Labor Act, for industry?

Mr. EMERY. I would support it to the full extent that it represented a valid exercise of the commerce power of Congress. We could not support it to an extent that it undertook to replace the local government of the States, and turned them into provinces governed from Washington by an administrator under the commerce clause.

Senator WAGNER. Are you in sympathy with Mr. Eastman's statement, recently, to the effect of company-dominated unions?

Mr. EMERY. I have not seen the statement, Senator. I cannot respond to it.

Senator WAGNER. It was widely published.

Mr. EMERY. I did not happen to see it. If you have a copy of it, I would be very glad to see it.

Senator WAGNER. Well, it is in the record.

Mr. EMERY. All right.

Senator DAVIS. I think the unfair labor practices, under Mr. Eastman's latest report, are probably stronger than the unfair labor practices here.

Mr. EMERY. I think the railway labor practices are substantially similar to those in section 7–A of the National Recovery Act, except that I believe that there is a prohibition against the use of funds which may be loaned to a railroad from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to support a company-dominated union, as it is there defined, coming within the inhibitions of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. How much more time do you desire, Mr. Emery?

Mr. EMERY. It depends upon the interruptions, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I am afraid we have been delaying you a good deal by our interruption.

Mr. EMERY. I beg your pardon. I am sorry to have delayed the committee, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right. You may proceed. You are not to blame; we are.

Mr. EMERY. The bill before you recognizes coercion only by the employer, and the Railway Dispute Act forbids it likewise by the employee or his organization. The Railway Act lays duties upon each. This bill recognizes no duty except by the employer.

The Railway Act encourages and protects agreements between individual carriers and their employees. The effect of the bill before you is to outlaw such arrangements and deny to the industrial and commercial employers and employees the liberty and opportunity to make them as they choose, between themselves.

Although the Railway Labor Act deals only with an instrumentality of interstate commerce over which Congress has plenary and exclusive control, it contains only one provision that is coercive, that is the preservation of the status quo, in the case of a dispute, until the President may investigate any controversy that threatens the interruption of commerce. It even provides that a refusal to arbitrate is not to be construed as the violation of any legal obligation. That is section 7 of the act—

> That the failure or refusal of either party to submit a controversy to arbitration shall not be construed as a violation of any legal obligation imposed upon such party by the terms of this act.

Senator WAGNER. Do you favor compulsory arbitration?

Mr. EMERY. I do not. I do favor compulsory investigation.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. The bill before you, proceeding in a field which Congress may not regulate, undertakes to compel, without authority, where the Railway Labor Dispute Act leaves the parties to persuade each other, although possessing full authority to compel a decision. Since, in the famous case which arose out of the Adamson law, the Supreme Court held that where a combination threatened an interruption of commerce, with failure to reach an agreement with respect to wages, the Congress of the United States could temporarily impose an agreement upon the parties to prevent the interruption of the movement of an instrumentality of interstate commerce. Let there be no misunderstanding, Mr. Chairman, that you are dealing now with an undisputed field of Congressional authority, when you deal with an instrumentality of interstate commerce. Because not only are the physical instrumentalities which move over the tracks, but the managers and the men are in contemplation of law, instrumentalities of interstate commerce and subject to its exclusive and plenary control. That is not the case here, but quite the reverse.

Indded, the Senate of the United States went so far, in the Transportation Act of 1920, in its endeavor to protect the paramount public interest in uninterrupted transportation, as to make it a crime for managers or men to combine or agree to acts affecting the interruption of interstate commerce, without submitting their disputes to a board created for that purpose.

The Congress refused to go so far, in a field of undisputed authority. Until this bill proposed it, no one ever dared to suggest that the Federal Government possesses, under the commerce power, the authority to mix the realtion between a farmer and his field hands, or a laundry operator and his operatives and penalize either for undertaking to initiate a plan of employment relationship.

This bill would undertake to compel employment relationships in every locality, although Congress would not go so far in its unquestioned authority over the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. As for the Federal Trade Commission Act, it is sufficient to say that it deals wholly with unfair methods of competition in interstate commerce, and the Supreme Court has said that even in this field, the judiciary may reexamine its findings of fact and its conclusions of law. It dare not write a complaint of a general nature, as this bill provides, but specifically describes the kind of unfair competition with which it charges any person, and gives him 30 days in which to answer, although this bill could require him to so do within 24 hours. It must, itself, initiate a judicial proceeding to enforce its order, although this board would carry the proceeding and enforcement of its own order. The exercise of power, in the case of the Federal Trade Commission, is surrounded with safeguards, entirely absent from the pending bill.

Now, having thus compared the measure with its alleged exemplars, observe its manifest unfairness. It prohibits lockouts. It encourages strikes; for the former is an "unfair labor practice," and the latter is, by the language of this bill, to be neither interferred with nor impeded. It proceeds upon the theory that every strike is justifiable and apparently of public benefit. A lockout, which is almost unknown, is declared wrong, although the right to discharge is the correlative of the right to quit.

The proponents of this measure obviously do not agree with the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court, written by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Dorchey v. Kansas (272 U.S.), in which he said:

> Neither the common law nor the fourteenth amendment confers the absolute right to strike.

I do not make the comparison to defend lockouts, but to point out that at a time when the restoration of employment is vital to recovery, one bad practice by organized labor is, by statutory language, encouraged. The other, by employers, is outlawed. We condemn unrestricted strikes just as we condemn lockout. They deserve to join in limbo the blacklist and the boycott.

It cannot be forgotten, gentlemen of the committee, that three Presidents of the United States, two Democrats and one Republican, have each been compelled to seek the courts of the United States to protect the public against actual or threatened strikes, so vast in their proportions as to menace their transportation or deprive them of their fuel supply.

Apply this measure to practical and existing conditions, and observe how it operates. It would make every striker remain an employee, irrespective of the policy of his organization or his conduct. Can that be denied? Every employer, under penalty of law, must deal with him. A worker who dared to believe that any strike could be wrong or unjustifiable and took the striker's place, is not even an employee. A human being is thus made a legal cipher by those who express profound interest in human right. The employer who does not deal with representatives of a striking group who are declared by law his employees, however disgraceful their conduct, however extreme their demands, however criminal the character of their leaders or the conduct of their strike, may be summoned from any part of the United States, charged with the unfair practice of not recognizing or dealing or undertaking to deal with them, and charged with undertaking to influence their policy or initiate a change in it, and be assessed damages or asked to reinstate those who have acted without justification.

Every single statement that I have made is an operating effect of this bill. If any member of the committee cares to deny it, I will be glad to point out the section to which it applies. The sponsors of this bill do not recognize the evils of jurisdictional disputes which punish innocent employers and employees alike. This city has endured many of them. Public building has been interrupted in this city for months at a time, because two unions could not determine whether a carpenter or a steamfitter should put an appliance on a radiator and hundreds of thousands of dollars of wages have been lost. Organized labor has been unable to settle their own difficulties within its own ranks; and yet, you would not impede the right to strike. You would not lessen these things that affect the public interest.

Senator WAGNER. You know, as Chairman of the Board, after a great deal of difficulty, I straightened out one of those.

Mr. EMERY. You did, Mr. Chairman, but I observed——

Senator WAGNER. Of course, I agree with you.

Mr. EMERY. That you kept away from most of the jurisdictional disputes that occur, with the care that a good housewife displays in the presence of a bad egg.

Senator WAGNER. I think you are very much mistaken. You are making some statements that I would not make.

Mr. EMERY. Oh.

Senator WAGNER. Now, whenever we were asked to consider a jurisdictional dispute we have done it, but the employers themselves, in some instances, asked that the American Federation of Labor, with their own machinery, adjust these disputes. At the request of the employers, that was done; but in the case of the Labor Building down here, it was one in which I intruded myself without invitation, and we finally adjusted the differences. There was considerable difficulty, and I agree with you that that type of strike is entirely unjustified. It ought not to exist.

Mr. EMERY. And it is one of the most serious causes of loss to both workmen and employers that we have in the whole labor field.

Senator WAGNER. No question about it. No question about it.

Mr. EMERY. And that is one of the reasons, Mr. Chairman, perhaps one of the very strongest reasons——

Senator WAGNER. I was distressed at the time.

Mr. EMERY. For the growth of the employee representation plan; I mean, by direct plant contact between manager and men.

Senator WAGNER. Well, you have let something out of the bag, there, that you shouldn't have.

Mr. EMERY. What? What is it? I will be very glad to know.

Senator WAGNER. You say these jurisdictional disputes were what prompted employers to organize their own labor unions.

Mr. EMERY. No. I said it was one of them.

Senator WAGNER. You should not have said that.

Mr. EMERY. I might have named a number of others—strikes, direct and sympathetic, boycotts; coercion in many forms; experience with broken contracts.

Senator WAGNER. I fear it will weaken your theory.

Mr. EMERY. All sorts of experience, my dear Senator, have been the cause of new methods, because they do not come into existence, and they do not grow, and they do not meet with that approval of employees in great numbers, unless they have a very solid foundation. The difficulty, of course, is that our good friends in organized labor do not like the competition of other forms of organization. They would prefer to have a monopoly, which is a very natural, human desire.

Senator WAGNER. We are not concerned with that.

Mr. EMERY. But I am afraid the Senator's bill is going to get it for them.

Senator WAGNER. You do not know, Mr. Emery, or I am sure you would not talk this way, that since the enactment of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, there has been a tremendous drive, all through the country, among large employers, and those are really the only ones that we are dealing with. The argument about your employer that employs one man is good as an argument, but you know it has no application to the administration of an act like this, but all of the large employers through the country, suddenly adopted a company-union method. You are quite familiar with that provision, aren't you? And in some of them, the uncontradicted testimony has been offered as to how they were organized, and I am sure that you cannot agree, because, being a fair-minded man, you cannot agree with that method of organization. Do you, or do you not?

Mr. EMERY. I do not, and as the Senator will find, in any legal opinion or legal advice that we have ever given to manufacturers, out of the law department of this association—and they are all public matters; we are very glad to submit them to the examination of yourself or the committee—you will never find that we have suggested that anyone was free to establish an organization of any kind, in which employees were the victims of coercion, intimidation, or restraint.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, I do not want to keep repeating, but I have said over and over again the large majority of employers want to be fair with their employees.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. And I am fair with them.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. But sometimes they are unable to be as fair as they would like to be, because of the keen competition with employees who are unfair to other workers, and these laws are always passed for the minority recalcitrants, not for the majority.

Mr. EMERY. Well, I suppose the Senator noticed the vast number of employers who flocked into this committee room last week, to support this bill.

Senator WAGNER. Well, that is the history of all acts.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. The Workmen's Compensation Law. I do not know whether you were an active opponent of that in 1913, in New York State. That was a bill I introduced.

Mr. EMERY. On the contrary, I was a strong proponent of it.

Senator WAGNER. Then you were not articulate, because there were no employers that came before the committee, favoring it.

Mr. EMERY. I was very articulate.

Senator WAGNER. Well, I did not see you there.

Mr. EMERY. Only, I did not happen to be of sufficient importance to catch the Senator's ear.

Senator WAGNER. In 1913, in New York State?

Mr. EMERY. I remember we began the agitation in the National Association of Manufacturers, for the substitution of workmen's compensation for employers' liability, in 1909.

Senator WAGNER. Well, if you will look at the record of 1913, every employer that was represented at a hearing opposed the act. There was only one, the enlightened Chamber of Commerce of Rochester, that, with some modifications, which modifications were made, favored the act. All of the employers opposed it upon the ground it was an added burden.

Mr. EMERY. And the first act was declared unconstitutional, was it not?

Senator WAGNER. No.

Mr. EMERY. Was it not, by your court?

Senator WAGNER. I am not speaking of that act.

Mr. EMERY. But I am, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. Yes. Well——

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. Well, nobody thought very much of that act, anyway.

Mr. EMERY. No, of course not, but the employers opposed it.

Senator WAGNER. But I am talking about the act of 1913, which was passed after we amended the constitution.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. The first act was the third unconstitutional, and there was such a feeling of resentment in the State of New York, that the legislature passed the amendment to the State constitution, which, by an overwhelming vote, was adopted by the people, something like 30 to 1. However, that change empowered us to enact a workmen's compensation act, and then, in 1913, I introduced the law into the State. Now, I know something about the history of that. All of the employers, mistakenly, because they admit their mistake now—were opposed to that act, and yet, within a year or two they discovered that it was a great blessing, a great boon for industry as well as for labor, and yet, it was regarded as a one-sided act, then.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you proceed with your analysis?

Mr. EMERY. The sponsors of this bill do not recognize the evils of jurisdictional disputes, which punish innocent employers and employees alike, or sympathetic strikers who seek to compel third persons to become parties to their battles. It makes employers criminals. It denounces them as coercive. It utterly ignores the overwhelming evidence supplied again and again of the continuous, determined, and aggressive coercion constantly directed against those employers, and employees, by organized labor.

Senator WAGNER. What do you mean, it makes them criminals? What do you mean by that?

Mr. EMERY. I am referring to the fact that the bill here by its unfair practices declares the employers commit an unlawful act. It does not declare him to be a criminal in the sense it puts him in jail, but it makes him a violator, and, of course, with the Senator's suggestion, the gentleman on the House side has been willing to make him a criminal by introducing the bill with that amendment. I hope the Senator did not suggest that it be made stricter.

Senator WAGNER. I made no suggestion to the Congressman. As a matter of fact, I did not know that change had been made.

Mr. EMERY. I invite the Senator's attention to it, and I hope he will use his good offices.

Senator WAGNER. We are dealing with the bill before us.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir, although the Senator has influence in both Houses.

Senator WAGNER. I have not—well, I have when I am right. You have not had so much influence down here in all of your advocacy, because you have not been right. When you are right, I have been with you, on the Recovery Act, for instance. You were against section 7 (a), just as you are today.

Mr. EMERY. I was against other things.

Senator WAGNER. But you were for the advantages of the employers, just as I was, or the trade associations, and for the repeal of the antitrust law. You were for that all right, were you not?

Mr. EMERY. I never suggested the repeal of the antitrust law.

Senator WAGNER. What did you suggest, its modification?

Mr. EMERY. I suggested its modification.

Senator WAGNER. I meant that——

Mr. EMERY. A different method of administering it.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. I want to make it clear, Senator, that the advantages to which you refer under the codes, do not go to employers, as such; they go to manufacturers or producers, or merchants, as such. This controls methods of competition. It is hardly an advantage to increase their operating costs by other means. That is something that they have not got but which they have accepted as a necessary means of cooperating and getting ourselves out of the situation in which we now are.

But, the comparison between the right to organize on the part of labor, if you please, and the right to organize on the part of the employer is without foundation, because it is not as an employer that he is permitted to organize. To the extent to which he is an employer it is the Government which has determined what his hours and wages shall be in supervising conditions under which code changes may be made. They are ultimately determined by the President of the United States at the present time, under the agreement the employer has made with him.

Senator WAGNER. Am I right, Mr. Emery, that you are opposed to section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. EMERY. We were opposed to the very thing which was stated in there, which we undertook to change, and which is the very subject of discussion now, and that was the continuous misrepresentation of employment relations that lies in the words "company union". An epithet is worth an army at times, and that is an epithet that has been used with the utmost freedom by those who want to misrepresent the most modern method of employment relationship that has been developed between employer and employee.

Senator WAGNER. I thought you and I had agreed.

Mr. EMERY. The Senator separates from it every time he is right, and says I am wrong.

Senator WAGNER. Don't you distinguish between a company-dominated union and just a company union?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; but I distinguish all other kinds of organizations that are dominated, too.

Senator WAGNER. Well—excuse me.

Mr. EMERY. Certainly.

Great Britain undertook to give exemption from liability to trade unions in 1906. It repented in 1927 and in the trade disputes act of that year, it, by law distinguished legal from illegal strikes; prohibited participation in the latter or the use of trade-union funds to support them, and armed its attorney general with the power to enforce the law and enjoin illegal acts. Through 3 years of labor government, the law remained unchanged, supported by an overwhelming public opinion which required that neither employer or employee should be permitted to combine to the injury of the public. That is the law today. The impartial arm of the English law lays its heavy hand upon each and invalidates public contracts providing discrimination in employment between members and nonmembers of trade unions.

That is a remarkable statement for an English-speaking country, which is our mother-in-law, and yet it is borne out by the experience of 25 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, we must leave. There is a vote being recorded in the Senate now, and we must adjourn the meeting until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. EMERY. May I finish then?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. I thank the Committee greatly for their indulgence.

(Whereupon, at 12:30 p.m., a recess was taken until 10 a.m., March 27, 1934.)

TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR BOARD

TUESDAY, MARCH 27, 1934

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a.m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C., Senator David I. Walsh presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murphy, Thomas, Borah, and Davis; also Senator Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order, please. Are you ready to proceed, Mr. Emery?

STATEMENT OF JAMES A. EMERY—Resumed

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, how much more time do you think you will take?

Mr. EMERY. I can get through very rapidly, Mr. Chairman, according to the inquiries of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, please, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. I believe this hearing, Mr. Chairman, is entirely between the committee and ourselves this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the others will be here shortly. They have not got the obligations that the Chair has to be on time or nearly on time.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when you recessed yesterday I had been comparing the Trade Disputes Act of Great Britain of 1927, which is now the law of the land, with the proposals contained in this measure, in an endeavor to show that after 20 years of experience Great Britain had found it necessary in the public interest to place upon combinations of labor the restrictions which it likewise placed upon other combinations in the protection of the public interest and to distinguish between legal and illegal strikes and otherwise provide for the protection of the public, while this measure ignored all but one factor in the employment equation.

Unfortunately, in the absence of the distinguished Senator from New York, I am not aware of what changes he proposes in the bill referred to in the public press or I would, of course, confine myself to what is immediately before the committee, and I must, therefore, assume that, with such slight changes as were discussed yesterday, the measure is before you.

So, if I may proceed, sir, I want to recall to you that I quoted from Mr. Justice Brandeis yesterday morning, but I did not at that time give the page, and I think it should be placed in the record. I was reading from page 94 of the 1933 edition of his volume, Business—a Profession. It is published, with a foreword by Prof. James Bonbright, by Hale, Cushman & Flint.

In that connection, if I may quote the distinguished Justice once again, I want to explain in answer to the criticisms that have been made that employers hastened to resist some of the proposals of this measure which we believe are unsound, that there are some things they have been unwilling at times to arbitrate, which would seem to indicate a stubborn, unfair attitude on their part which ignored the public interest. The distinguished Justice, in referring to these questions, makes this interesting observation which fairly states exactly the position which I think we occupy today. After referring to the necessity, which is fundamental for the continuing intercourse of employers and employees as the only possible means by which their delicate and vitally important relation as partners in production and distribution and transportation can be successfully carried forward, because, sir, good relations are not a manufacture, they are a growth; they are not a mechanism, they are an organism; they come slowly but surely by the conduct of both parties in the determination and development of their relations. Their importance cannot be overemphasized in our social structure nor can I overemphasize the importance which the employers of the United States attach to them, so far as I know their point of view.

Said Mr. Brandeis, after referring to the vital importance of continuing conferences in all their employment relations to develop good understanding—I quote:

> But conferences, though wisely conducted and with the best of intentions on either side, do not always result in agreement. Men fail at times to see the right; and, indeed, what is right is often in doubt. For such cases arbitration affords frequently an appropriate remedy. This remedy deserves to take its place among the honorable means of settling those questions to which it properly applies. Questions arise, however, which may not be arbitrated. Differences are sometimes fundamental. Demands may be made which the employer, after the fullest consideration, believes would if yielded to, destroy the business. Such differences cannot be submitted to the decision of others. Again, the action of the union may appear to have been lawless or arbitrary, a substitution of force for law or for reason.
> What, then, should be the attitude of the employer?

And this is the answer of a great student of employment relations, in the maturity of his years, and in the dignity of his present great position:

> Lawless or arbitrary claims of organized labor should be resisted at whatever cost. I have said that it is essential in dealing with these problems that the employer should strive only for the right. It is equally as important that he should suffer no wrong to be done unto him. The history of Anglo-Saxon and of American liberty rests upon that struggle to resist wrong—to resist it at any cost when first offered rather than to pay the penalty of ignominious surrender. It is the old story of "ship money", of "the writs of assistance", and of "taxation without representation." The struggle for industrial liberty must follow the same lines.
> If labor unions are arbitrary or lawless, it is largely because employers have ignominiously submitted to arbitrariness or lawlessness as a temporizing policy or under a mistaken belief as to their own immediate interests.

Later he continues, and this goes to the very crux of the vital issues before this committee, these issues of fundamental principle upon which men must differ at times if they accept the principles and the unchanged course of American tradition over the century:

You may compromise—

He says—

a matter of wages, you may compromise a matter of hours—if the margin of profit will so permit. No man can say with certainty that his opinion is the right one on such a question. But you may not compromise on a question of morals, or where there is lawlessness or even arbitrariness. Industrial liberty, like civil liberty, must rest upon the solid foundation of law. Disregard the law in either, however good your motives, and you have anarchy. The plea of trades unions for immunity, be it from injunction or from liability for damages, is as fallacious as the plea of the lynchers. If lawless methods are pursued by trades unions, whether it be by violence, by intimidation, or by the more peaceful infringement of legal rights, that lawlessness must be put down at once and at any cost.

I am quoting from pages 24, 25, and 26 of Business—a Profession, by Louis D. Brandeis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said that by the design of this measure it gradually forces in operating effect but one form of labor organization, and slowly but surely undertakes to drive all workers into it. It ignores successful and practical experiments in new forms of collective relationship. It would cast all labor relations in one mold, granting a labor monopoly to those who employ it. It will develop bitterness, discord, and conflict by outlawing the natural development of intercourse through conference and cooperation in other forms of collective bargaining. It would destroy in one class of workers and employers the dearest rights which it undertakes to secure for another organization of workers. It outlaws that natural and necessary intercourse of employer and employee while ignoring or deliberately encouraging coercion and unfair practices by organized labor. It fashions an administrative board that is partisan and political by composition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to the nature of the board that is here proposed, and compare it with the boards which have been erected by the Congress in other fields of employment relationship.

The distinguished Senator from New York has said, and I pointed out to you yesterday, how little of the parallel was true, that this measure is modeled upon the Railroad Labor Disputes Act of May 20, 1926. I pointed out the various differences to you yesterday, the chief of which were that that placed upon both parties the duty of undertaking to avoid disputes by providing machinery of adjustment; in that act it is very carefully declared that nothing in the act must be construed to prevent individual carriers and their employees from erecting their own machinery for the adjustment of their disputes. Under that very system methods of employment relationships that have extended over 12 or 15 years and even longer, for instance, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, and if this committee would summon into its presence those who have been charged the workers on that road, union or nonunion, with the operation of that plan, you might learn much to guide you in the practical consideration of the great matters before you.

Although Congress possesses the plenary and exclusive authority to deal with an instrumentality of interstate commerce over which it has the control of a sovereign almost without limitation, except by the other prohibitions of our Constitution, it did not choose to exert that authority, although your own body, the Senate, passed a drastic proposal in 1919 to lay the foundation of the Transportation Act of 1920 which would have made it a criminal offense for eiher management or men to undertake to interrupt by any agreement or combination the movement of commerce between States without first submitting their dispute to a board created for that purpose. You preferred to believe, and I think you did rightly, that relations between employer and employee must not rest upon compulsion and coercion but must be built up by good understanding and reciprocal consideration and good will. That is what the Railroad Labor Disputes Act does.

Now, the Railroad Labor Disputes Act placed upon both parties the duty of avoiding disputes. Every single term applies equally to employers and employees. Like the President's notable statement of yesterday in the settling of the automobile strike, this act, upon which it could be said he had modeled his utterance, declares that neither party shall coerce the other in the selection of its representatives in any dealing between the two.

The act did not set up a board to arbitrate or settle the disputes, however serious they might be. It left the parties to determine the nature of their adjustment mechanism. What it did do, sir, was to establish a board of mediation and conciliation because they relied upon the intervention of impartial and fair-minded parties in a serious dispute to mollify the bitterness that might exist between them in the height of discussion and difference of opinion.

I am sure the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, out of his long years in the Department of Labor, will bear me out in the belief that the conciliation efforts of the Department of Labor when handled with impartiality, tact, and good will and patience have produced far more satisfactory results than any efforts at coercion on either side.

That is precisely what the Labor Disputes Act does. It created a board of mediation; but observe how carefully it was done. It provided, first, that this board of mediation should not have appointed on it "any person in the employment or who is pecuniarily or otherwise interested in any organization of employees or any carrier."

Whenever there devolves upon this board the duty, not of arbitrating, because they cannot arbitrate, but where the two parties agree to arbitration and they fail within a reasonable length of time to select a third arbitrator, this board may appoint him, and in appointing him they must appoint an arbitrator who is wholly disinterested. If after he is appointed it should develop on the charge of either party and upon investigation by the board that he was not disinterested, he must be promptly removed and a disinterested and impartial person appointed in his place.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from NewYork thought I reflected upon the Labor Board yesterday in its personnel because of a comment I made. I did not criticize it because its members acted without pay. I criticized it because they acted without authority. I could establish that very clearly and very fully that in all their acts between August 5, 1933, and December 16, 1933, they acted under an Executive order which authorized them only to interpret differing opinions with respect to the President's reemployment agreement, yet they undertook to exercise repeatedly jurisdiction over disputes arising under codes of industries which had been codified, over which they had no authority whatever.

But, for the purpose of comparing the operation of this bill. Look at the composition of that board. I do not say this to reflect upon any person in it. I say it because it rests upon fundamental facts of human nature that no wise legislative body would ever ignore.

You cannot make a man an impartial judge in his own case. He cannot both be policeman, grand juror, prosecuting attorney, and, finally, the eminently impartial judge. No one demonstrated it more clearly than that distinguished, active, and energetic leader of organized labor, Mr. William Green, when he descended from the bench where the Labor Board was sitting in the automobile case, appeared as a witness before this committee, decided the case in your presence, and returned to the hearing. Mr. Green was sitting on the Board as the president of the American Federation of Labor and he could not possibly sit there in an impartial manner. It would be quite as impossible to expect that from him as it would be to expect that Mr. Hitler would be entirely impartial in the presence of a Jewish rabbi.

Senator DAVIS. But there were other representatives on the Board that were representing employers?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Senator DAVIS. You had Mr. Du Pont and other representatives of business on the Labor Board?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; but what I am trying to point out is that if you wanted to create an impartial tribunal, it will not be composed of employers and employees. If you were going to undertake to exercise the judicial power of the United States by attaching within the jurisdiction of the courts at any time——

The CHAIRMAN. Your argument would apply to employers as much as to employees?

Mr. EMERY. Certainly; always to employers.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, your contention is that you cannot have any satisfactory result from a commission or board or court that represents the two conflicting interests?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; my argument simply is that when you have a board of arbitration on which you have the two parties represented they are advocates, and the only disinterested person is the arbitrator who is chosen by the two, and upon whom both undertake to exert their influence. That is what this bill proposes to do.

Senator DAVIS. In other words, you believe in a nonpartisan board?

Mr. EMERY. In a nonpartisan board if it can be selected, and I believe you have accomplished more as Secretary of Labor in your time where you had a conciliator not a party to a dispute who walked in and offered his services to the parties in dispute and both accepted them; he had great success in bringing them together so far as the issues did not involve principles which could not be surrendered by either party.

Senator DAVIS. I want to repeat my question that I asked yesterday. I did not get an answer to it. Would you and those you represent be in favor of an act for industry such as the Transportation Act is for the railroads?

Mr. EMERY. To the extent that it would be within the power of Congress to enact, but I want to point out what the differences are between the two. I want to insist, Mr. Chairman, that you have ample machinery in the Department of Labor in the character of the conciliators and mediators whom you chose to do a very effective service in disputes in the United States, not by coercion, not by compulsion, but by persuasion and good will.

The fundamental defect of all these proposals of this character is that they speak in terms of conflict, and not of conference and cooperation. They are written in terms of bitterness, in which some party is to be forced to do something against his will, whereas the best results are accomplished, not when parties are in that state of mind or when the arbitrator is supposed to be in that state of mind.

It is this evidence, Mr. Chairman, of failure through partisan operation that makes one exceedingly skeptical of the efforts of a body of this kind. When you carry the idea into other administrative bodies you may expect the same result.

Let me call your attention to the C.W.A. as it undertakes to operate, say, in the city of New York today. The C.W.A. provides that if persons are seeking employment among the thousands of employed in the city of New York—do you think a skilled workman in any one of the trades can get work from the C.W.A. unless he belongs to a private organization? He cannot. On February 5, 1934, the city Civil Works Administration publicity department declared——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. What would you say about the unsatisfactory results from commissions that are composed of partisans? I have been very much troubled during my public career with the other alternative. The regulatory bodies which States and the Federal Government have set up, have too often been appointed on the basis of prejudice for or against a particular group. Let us take the regulation of public utilities; one Governor's appointments always will be more or less hostile to public utilities and their interests, known to be, and another Governor will name to the commission citizens who are known to be in favor of and more or less under obligations to the public utilities, men whose philosophy is in sympathy with their extreme demands. This condition often runs through all our regulatory bodies so that our citizens at times get distrustful of regulatory bodies.

Mr. EMERY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Take the Federal Trade Commission; it is supposed to be a judicial body; if you put in all one kind of men who have a particular kind of political philosophy, you are going to bring about a condition where the public will soon lose confidence in their opinion and their judgment. It is a very serious problem.

You know, what I am describing led one of the most prominent Senators in the Senate a few years ago, who had long favored regulation of railroads and trade and utilities, to threaten the abolition of all regulatory bodies because he said that the officials had named to these boards persons who were out of sympathy with the law providing for regulation.

It is a difficult problem to know where to go and how to get a judicial body.

Mr. EMERY. Your own great State has pursued a course of marked soundness in that it appoints judges for life so thay may be relieved, so far as possible, of being in the position of those who must frequently return for elevation to office and satisfy public criticism of judicial decisions on which the public is probably not a very good judge. The argument that I am making particularly in this matter is to point out that with these difficulties facing you, how little support there is for the creation of a body with the enormous power that is here proposed, because this proposes not merely somebody to arbitrate a single dispute, which one might criticize because of its very nature it was going to favor one party rather than another in a pending dispute. Here is a permanent body that is to hold office for years.

The CHAIRMAN. From your view, there have appeared before the committee, as you probably know, persons favoring this bill who have suggested that the commission be comprised of three persons representing the public, and if any representatives of the employers or employees were to participate that they be associate members and have no voting power. You recall testimony to that effect?

Mr. EMERY. I did not happen to hear that. It is quite possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; by persons favoring the bill.

Mr. EMERY. I am pointing out here just how an administrative body in the responsible position of administering Federal relief, with enormous funds at its disposal, operates in the great city of New York by providing in the following way:

Col. Walter A. DeLamater, acting administrator, Civil Works Administration for New York State, announced today (February 5) that in the future requisitions for skilled labor for C.W.A. projects would be made upon the recognized labor unions of the city, and that only in the event these unions are unable to supply the required number of qualified workers within 48 hours, would requisitions go to the State employment service.

I have before me, and I read from the circular of the city Civil Works Administration, February 10, 1934, and from a further statement made by them entitled "Federal Civil Works Administration of the city of New York, 111 Eighth Avenue, New York City, Instructions and Information for Union Locals in Connecting With Supplying Workers for the Federal Civil Works Administration." I will read this paragraph, which is the significant one——

The CHAIRMAN. I had supposed that the Civil Works Administration was a relief measure.

Mr. EMERY. I thought so also.

The CHAIRMAN. And I supposed that preference was to be given to the hungry and destitute who were unemployed.

Mr. EMERY. I want to read this significant sentence. I would like to put the circular in the record because it is a rather significant one, and may I have your permission to do so?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. You can read the rest, but this is the statement to which I refer:

The Federal Civil Works Administration of New York City hereby notifies all unions who are supplying men that if the privilege of supplying men is in any way abused in the opinion of the administrator, this privilege may be and will be immediately withdrawn from the local union which abuses this privilege, and the men thereafter will be obtained from the Federal and State employment services.

The Federal and State employment services are the places where unemployed register, where thousands of people walking the streets of the great city seeking work undertake to relate themselves to their Government seeking work, and they are met with the declaration that a private organization in the city of New York will supply the skilled labor that may be required. I just wanted to point this out.

The CHAIRMAN. It is possible that applies only to public works.

Mr. EMERY. This is the C.W.A., and on the reading of this statement you can form your own conclusion.

(The circular referred to by Mr. Emery is as follows:)

FEDERAL CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK—INSTRUCTIONS AND INFORMATION FOR UNION LOCALS IN CONNECTION WITH SUPPLYING WORKERS FOR THE FEDERAL CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Each local will appoint an "authorized representative" who will transact all business for the local with the Federal Civil Works Administration. This representative will obtain from the C.W.A. a supply of "referral cards" and will give the C.W.A. specimen of his signature. When the C.W.A. has need of workers it will mail to the authorized representative of the union local of that trade a requisition which will state the number of men and all other information necessary. The representative of the local will choose the men to fill this requisition and will give to each man a referral card properly made out. The worker will present the referral card to the C.W.A. office indicated on the referral card. Detailed instructions on how to make out the referral card are attached hereto.

In connection with the method of choosing which worker among the unemployed in the local shall be sent out in response to the C.W.A. requisition, there are several points that must be observed by the representatives of the union responsible for making this choice. There is attached hereto an extract of the C.W.A. rules and regulations entitled "Conditions of Employment." The provisions shown in this extract are part of the Federal law and must be followed by the labor unions in choosing their men. There is also attached hereto an explanation of exactly what the term "ex-service men" means, where it is referred to in the section entitled "Labor Preferences."

In addition to following the above mentioned regulations, it must be definitely understood by the union locals that the privilege of supplying men to the Civil Works Administration shall in no case be used to force the payment of dues by men who are delinquent in their dues, and that there shall be no discrimination of any kind with respect to the status of any one regarding dues. The Federal Civil Works Administration of New York City hereby notifies all unions who are supplying men that if the privilege of supplying men is in any way abused in the opinion of the Administrator, this privilege may be and will be immediately withdrawn from the local union which abuses this privilege, and the men thereafter will be obtained from the Federal and State employment services.

Care must be taken in assigning men to jobs upon receipt of requisitions that the men possess all the qualifications called for by the requisitions. The C.W.A. cannot place men to work on any job unless the men are fully qualified to do the work that will be expected of them.

In case any members of a union local believe that some individual is occupying a position for which he is not qualified, the following procedure has been set up to take care of this situation: Such complaint will be reported by the union member to the authorized representative of his local, who will in turn report it to the office of the organization with which his local is affiliated; the complaint will then be presented in writing to the C.W.A. A rerating board has been established by the local C.W.A. which will investigate every complaint of this character and will establish the fitness of any particular man or men for the positions which they hold. It must be clearly understood that no man or men on the jobs will be recognized by those in charge of the job as authorized to bring up this question of qualifications of individuals. Such questions must be handled through the authorized union representatives by written communication to the central office of the C.W.A. at 111 Eighth Avenue.

Mr. EMERY. I wanted to point this out because it illustrates the abuses likely to arise when commissions and bureaus are created and given arbitrary powers.

Under the P.W.A., a private contractor dealing with the union very probably continues to deal with the union. If he has an agreement to employ their members he continues to do so and he gets them from the usual sources. But, he is a private employer. In this instance it is the Government which is the employer, and the Government of the United States can no more arbitrarily discriminate between a man who is a member of a private organization and a man who is not, in giving public funds for the administration of relief, than it can deny that one is a citizen and declare that the other one is. It is a form of privilege, so indefensible, so inexcusable, so merciless in its operation that it seem impossible to believe that the administration of a public law could be conducted in such a manner.

I refer to this because it further illustrates the serious dangers involved in giving the great and permanent and continuous and arbitrary power to such bodies as are proposed to be created in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having concluded that aspect of the bill, let me hurry forward.

I have analyzed the bill, I have called your attention to its particular provisions, I have tried to take it apart, piece by piece, and point out, not only the effect of its particular provisions, but the effect of the whole when put together, what they produce.

I have called your attention, of course, to the chief argument that I have heard here by proponents, that there has been undue activity on the part of employers since the operation of the Recovery act in the formation of what are called company unions or what may be called work councils or employment representation plans or any method by which the employees of a plant enter into voluntary agreements with the employer.

It is charged these have been carried forward with undue haste. Well, of course, one who reads the public press observes that our labor-union friends have acted with considerable ingenuity and activity. They have every now and then created the impression that the Government of the United States was anxious to have organization effected and that they were the medium selected. I call your attention to a circular, Mr. Chairman, and this is only one of thousands. That is offered for the purpose of pointing out that the Government needs organization, as the Federation of Labor would have it. No one could object to their having every assistance of a private nature that they desire in the attempt to carry forward their organization, but surely they must not object to others who wish to have organizations somewhat different in character and equally voluntary.

That circular, let me say, reads: "The United States Government has said labor must organize", and then proceeds to point out just how it must organize. This is the Kentucky State Federation of Labor that points out they are the chosen agents.

(The circular referred to by the witness is attached as an exhibit.)

Mr. EMERY. There is one thing you will observe, that all these employee representation plans never have. It has never been called to your attention that they have undertaken to collect the dues of all the workers and transmit them to any private purse. Now, I want to call your attention to the bill again, because I want to summarize very briefly legal objections that go to the very heart of the question, Congressional power.

Senator DAVIS. Mr. Emery, it is not compulsory upon the part of any employer to collect dues of the union members, is it?

Mr. EMERY. Sir?

Senator DAVIS. It is not compulsory upon the part of any employer to collect the dues of members and turn them over to the union?

Mr. EMERY. No; I am talking about the well-recognized practice called the check-off.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought that was true at one time in the coal industry.

Senator DAVIS. This was understood at one time—that is mostly in the coal industry, between the coal operator and coal miner.

Mr. EMERY. There was much evidence submitted, sir, that in previous time in previous disputes to show that the check-off was not only collected from those who agreed to it, but it was required as a condition that it be collected from all in the employ of the company.

Senator DAVIS. That was an agreement entered into between the operators and the workers themselves; the Government did not interfere in any way or insist upon it?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; the Government has been a party to a very recent agreement in which the check-off was established in the captive mines in your State.

Senator DAVIS. Yes; but that was an agreement reached first between the employer and the worker.

Mr. EMERY. Yes; and that was an agreement in which the parties themselves agreed that it could be deducted from their wages, and to that no one can have any objection, but the important thing about it, I want to call your attention to, Senator——

Senator DAVIS. Just a minute. The check-off has been in many places for the rent of the house, and even has gone as far as church dues, but that is an understanding between the worker and employer.

Mr. EMERY. I am speaking of the check-off as I technically understand it, that is the collection by the employer of the dues of the organization. I do not know what they use it for.

Senator DAVIS. As I understand it, it is mutually entered into between the worker and employer and the employer is not compelled to do it.

Mr. EMERY. Let me call your attention, Senator, to this fact, put it any way you like and let it be absolutely legal, let it be an agreement between employer and employee that a certain sum shall be deducted from his wages for a certain purpose, now, any attempt on the part of the employer to influence the employee and discuss with him a change of policy with respect to that is an "unfair practice" under this bill.

I call it to your attention because I want to illustrate the fact that an unfair labor practice, which is a criminal offense in the House bill and an illegal thing here, is any attempt on the part of the employer to discuss, to change or influence the policy of a labor organization. For instance, here is an employer who is agreeing with the union that there shall be no apprentices or that there shall be only one apprentice to 50 men. Well, he thinks that is pretty restrictive and he undertakes to "influence" the union into changing its policy. Ah, along comes the Federal Labor Board and says, "You cannot do that, sir; that is an unfair labor practice to undertake to influence or change the policy of the union in that way."

Senator DAVIS. By the best stretch of my imagination I could not conceive it.

Mr. EMERY. You cannot conceive it?

Senator DAVIS. No.

Mr. EMERY. Then read the bill and your imagination will be aided.

Senator DAVIS. I have read it a dozen times and I could not see that in it.

Mr. EMERY. I will just read it to you again if I may, section 5:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer, or anyone acting in his interest, directly or indirectly * * *

(3) To initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, bylaws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization.

Here is a labor organization like the one I called your attention to in the testimony from the Lockwood committee yesterday that closed its books to new members. Suppose the employers say, "I don't want to make that agreement with you; I think you ought to change that restriction." If the employer undertakes to do that, what is he undertaking to do by section 5, subdivision (3)? He is undertaking to influence the bylaws or other governing rules of a labor organization; is he not? And if he does undertake to influence it he has become at once an offender against the law exactly as that section is written. There is no other construction possible.

Here is another interesting case, suggested by Mr. Untermeyer, I am talking about practical cases that have occurred, and not imaginary cases. On page 6843 of that record Mr. Untermeyer said:

Did you ever hear of labor unions ordering employers, summoning them before their executive boards and committees?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And imposing fines upon them and making the payment of those fines a condition upon which the men would continue to work?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You have heard of that?

And Mr. Gompers says, "Yes, sir."

Question. We are talking now—

He says again in another question—not about discussing with them; I am talking about summoning them before executive boards of the union and compelling them to pay fines as big as $1,000?"

Mr. Gompers answered—

For violation of the terms of a contract?

Question. No; not for violating a contract, but for alleged infringement of union regulations.

Then he said again, referring to the Jewish Bakers Union in New York, page 7122 of the testimony:

Question. Well, what do you think of a regulation that allows the following form of arbitration under the agreement, and none other, that if a business agent of the union is unable to settle a dispute, the employer binds himself to appear before the executive council of the local union and submit to its decision?

Supposing that to be as Mr. Untermeyer says, the rule of a trade union, and the employer thinks it is unfair and undertakes to change it, and says, "You ought to strike out that provision"; well, section 5, subdivision (3) of this act says if he undertakes to influence the governing rules or policies of that union he immediately commits an unfair labor practice.

I am not talking now about employee representation plans; I am talking about an employers agreement with the union which offers him that kind of an agreement. In this particular instance these rules if this bill had been the law would have immediately defined an offense to influence that bylaw, no matter how bad it was.

I am sure, Senator, when one thinks about that he will say to himself, "It would be an absurd law that undertakes to say that an employer or employee, when one offers an absurd bargain to another—that would be just as bad if the employer did it, of course—if one said to the other, I cannot undertake to influence your conduct in that regard to changing that bylaw, that regulation, that rule of your policy, because if I do so I violate the law of the land.

Now, let me hurry to a conclusion, Mr. Chairman, because you have given me great indulgence and I know you desire——

The CHAIRMAN. We would appreciate it because there are so many other witnesses.

Mr. EMERY. I have said this bill grants a power greater in nature and extent than Congress has been willing to give any court in the United States. In the face of 50 years of continuous decision by the Supreme Court of the United States it distorts the Congressional power to regulate intercourse between States to an indefensible authority to seize from them and regulate relations exclusively local on farm, factory, and mine. To this end it establishes what, in form and operating effect, would be a gigantic Federal police court.

I want to recapitulate the leading cases very quickly. They are so old, they are so familiar, that I need hardly explain them to you but I will give you the citations so you will have them.

Let me emphasize a principle, and I wish my distinguished friend, the Senator from New York, were here because I know he would enjoy hearing the very interesting remarks of Mr. Justice Holmes made in a Pennsylvania case which he decided not long before he left the bench. The Senator exhibited some impatience to constitutional objection yesterday. Well, Mr. Justice Holmes, out of the wisdom of his many years, said in this case of the Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahan (260 U. S. 416):

> We are in danger of forgetting that a strong desire to improve the public conditions is not enough to warrant achieving that desire by a shorter cut than the constitutional way of paying for the change.

That must be my justification for remarks about the proposal of commercial power here urged.

Now, it has been an accepted proposition that production and commerce are two different things. The one means the making and fabrication of goods and all the operations incident to it, and the other means intercourse between the States. That intercourse within the plenary and exclusive control of Congress. Production and all the incidents in relation to it are completely and exclusively within the control of the respective States.

One of the first cases to clarify that distinction, about 60 years ago, was the case of Coe v. Errol (116 U. S. 517). There a lumberman in New Hampshire, having prepared his logs for shipment, the log raft was tied up at Errol, N. H., and was there taxed by the town authorities. The tax was opposed on the ground that it could not be taxed by the State because that would be a burden on interstate commerce since the logs were intended to be taken down through the rivers to another State and then put into interstate commerce. In other words, that the loggers' intention to put them into interstate commerce made it impossible for the State to tax them.

"Oh, no", said the Supreme Court of the United States, "The intention of a man to put something into interstate commerce after he has manufactured it does not in the least change the exclusive power of the State over it while it is in production because commerce does not begin until manufacture has been ended."

Then in 128 U.S., at page 20, we had an interesting case that presents this distinction so clearly that I am sure the layman as well as a lawyer could easily see it.

The State of Kansas had provided for complete prohibition forbidding the manufacture of any kind of an intoxicating beverage. A brewer proceeded to make beer and was indicted for doing so. The case was defended on the ground that the brewery did not make the beer for sale in Kansas. It was making the beer for sale in another State, and since it was intended for interstate commerce, of course, the State did not have any authority to regulate the manufacture of the beer or any of the incidents of manufacture because that was the intent of the producer.

Well, the court put the difference between State and national control so clearly in denying that contention and declaring all the incidents of manufacture were within the control of the State that I venture to read just a part of the decision to you because it makes clear the principle of all these cases continuously accepted and applied up to this very last year by a unanimous court. In this case the court said:

> No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation, the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different, the buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation.

Now, says the court:

> If it be held that the term—

That is, commerce—

> includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested to the exclusion of the States with the power to regulate, not only manufacture but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining, in short, every branch of human endeavor; for is there one of them that does not contemplate more or less clearly an interstate or a foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South plant and cultivate and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all these delicate, multiform, and vital interests, interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the detaiis of their successful management.

That was said by the Supreme Court nearly 60 years ago and that has been uniformly followed right straight down to the present. In the Employers' Liability case (207 U. S.), where Congress undertook to change the rule of employers' liability for carriers, the first act was invalidated and the second was sustained. In response to the assertion of the Government in the first case that because a manufacturer engaged in interstate commerce, therefore his local relations became subject to the power of Congress, the court rejected it in the most emphatic way and said that the contention of the Government rested "upon the conception that the Constitution destroyed that freedom of commerce which was its purpose to maintain except upon such conditions as Congress might prescribe even though the conditions were otherwise beyond the power of Congress." That is precisely what this bill proposes to do.

Again, just to show you how steadily the courts have the distinction between commerce and production, they have said that coal mining is not commerce. That was in the Coronado Coal case, reported at 257 U.S. and 267 U.S., that coal mining is not commerce and is not subject to the regulation of Congress; manufacturing is not commerce, production is not commerce, building is not commerce; all these acts of production never commerce. Industrial Assoc. v. U.S. 268 U.S. 64; Oliver Iron Mining Co. v. Lord, 262 U.S. 172; Hope Natural Gas Co. v.. Hall, 274 U.S. 284; Champlain Refining Co. v. Cor. Comm., 286 U.S. 238.

Now, they said in the case of the Yurkonis v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western (238 U.S. 439)—in involving the injury of a man engaged in loading a coal car which was intended for interstate commerce. In that case the court said he was not engaged in interstate commerce, he was working as a miner as a part of his work loading a car, and although the car intended for interstate commerce, Congress has no control over mining because that is not within their power but wholly within the power and authority of the State

Then came the most interesting cases of all, and these are cases of the most vital importance because these are the cases which undertake to point out——

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a recent case upholding that doctrine?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; I have. The last case which I have is the case of the Utah Power & Light Company v. Pfost (286 U.S. 165). That was a case in which the State of Idaho undertook to levy a tax upon electric current and it was objected to on the ground that the current was carried over into the next State and that putting a tax on that current was putting a tax on interstate commerce.

The Supreme Court in a unanimous opinion held that what the State of Idaho undertook to tax was the transformation of mechanical energy into electrical energy, and when that product passed through the transformer and went as electrical current, transformed from mechanical power, manufactured into another stage like any other commodity in commerce, it became subject, of course, to the power of Congress and the State could not burden it, but the State retained exclusive right to tax it in the act of production.

The court said in this case, referring to the Utah Power & Light Company v. Pfost (286 U.S. 165, 181):

> Commerce does not begin until manufacturing is finished, and hence the commerce clause of the Constitution does not prevent the State from exercising exclusive control over the manufacture.

That is the last word of the Supreme Court of the United States a little over a year ago in 286 U.S. 165.

Now, look at the particular measure that excites your interest and attention right now. The theory of this bill on which the Senator attempts to hang the power of Congress, is stated in section 205 (a) that reads:

> The board is empowered to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice that burdens or affects commerce or obstructs the free flow of commerce, or has led or tends to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

On that hypothesis this bill predicates the application of the commerce power. Well, now, just notice this: The Supreme Court of the United States has had occasion to examine the application of the commerce power to local labor disputes several times, first in the case of the Coronado Mining Company v. The United Mine Workers (in 257 U.S.). The question, among other things, before the court was whether or not a local strike prevented the production of coal, operated as a restraint upon commerce, and was, therefore, in violation of the antitrust act. In other words, was this restraint of the production of coal a restraint of commerce?

Mr. Chief Justice Taft, in writing the opinion, said that it was not. He said more than that in the next case and to this I invite the very special attention of the committee. United Leather Workers v. Herkert, 265 U.S. 457.

The court called attention to the opinion of one of the dissenting judges, since this was an appeal which reversed the decision of the court of appeals. The Chief Justice quoted with approval the language of the dissenting judge below, who said that if it were held that a local strike which restricted production, and to that extent indirectly affected the flow of commerce or obstructed commerce, violated the Sherman Act, then every local strike that successfully restricts production would become a restraint of trade under the Antitrust Act, and all the strikers would constitute an unlawful combination. Chief Justice Taft concluded, "We cannot think Congress intended any such result in the enactment of the Antitrust Act, or that the decisions of this court warrant such construction."

The reasoning upon which this bill proceeds, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and the language of the Chief Justice, results in this: If you undertake to say that a strike, or other labor dispute, the object and purpose of which is not directly, primarily, and substantially affecting commerce, could be brought within commerce power, then you have made every local strike subject to restraint and prosecution as a violation of the Antitrust Act. The court goes into that at great length in the United Leather Workers v. Herkert (265 U.S. 457).

That presented a local strike of leather workers, a large number of them, in the city of St. Louis, and they were undertaking to prevent the manufacture of leather goods by their employer in order to enforce their demands. They were apparently conducting a very successful strike which the employer undertook to enjoin because of the effect of the strike. In refusing the injunction and in stating that the Antitrust Act did not apply to it, Mr. Justice Taft emphasized this fact again, that a local strike, confined to an attempt to affect manufacture, was not a strike that was within the control of the Antitrust Act as a restraint of commerce, and when they——

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, could you not amplify your legal argument by placing some of your citations in the record?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. I can be through within 5 minutes, I think, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will it be just 5?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; if you do not interrupt me.

The CHAIRMAN. I will call time on you at the end of 5 minutes.

Mr. EMERY. The case here is that of the United Leather Workers v. Herkert (265 U. S.), and with the permission of the committee, I will put the exact citation in the record:

> None of these cases, although they all illustrate the practical conception of interstate commerce as a flowing stream from one State to another formed by a regular course of business, can properly be said to support the argument that mere intention cutting down of manufacture or production is a direct restraint of commerce.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will conclude very rapidly.

Our conclusion, then, is that in the light of the argument we have endeavored to present to you the bill is invalid in law and unsound in policy. By its structure, piece by piece, it is shaped into a design which, by the author's own statements, by his rulings as a member of the Labor Board, by its unmistakable terms, is plainly intended to execute the declaration of the president of the American Federation of Labor, "There is no room in the United States for any other labor movement."

The issue it presents is plain. It is no mere dispute over policy between employers and labor unions. It is a deliberate step toward a Nation unionized by the act of Government. It would block the pathways of opportunity to all but members of a privileged organization. It would ultimately result in permitting the transportation and marketing of goods produced by unions only. It would destroy the elementary rights to remain unorganized, to select individual or collective bargaining, and to determine its form. If one is not equal in bargaining with many, many are not equal in bargaining power with one. One among 10,000 employees dealing individually with a corporation is at the same disadvantage, it is true, as the employer of one or more persons dealing with the power of a million men. Each deserves the protection of the law.

This bill multiplies the tremendous power for private and public injury of a vast combination without any corresponding legal responsibility. It is to be vested by law with the power of economic life and death over the worker who does not accept its dictation or rejects its leadership. Its enactment would mean that the public could be continually subjected to the interruption of production and distribution through a private association, enforcing its demands by the threatened paralysis of farm, factory, and mine.

This bill makes Government its recruiting sergeant. Its philosophy, realized in actuality and attaining the announced goal of its creed, means that the public could obtain its food, its fuel, its clothes, its shelter, and all its daily needs, conveniences and requirements, only under conditions fixed by a self-governing monopoly protected by an administrative body against interference. Every other form of organization and collective bargaining is outlawed and a single private organization is lifted to exclusive control of employment, while relieved of legal responsibility for the abuse of its power.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Emery. May I ask you just one question?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the organizations which you represent believe in the principle of section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. EMERY. Well, now, if I understand the principle, they do.

The CHAIRMAN. They do?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you modify or change that section or would you let it stand as it is and rely upon the criminal penalty that you referred to yesterday to be used to enforce it?

Mr. EMERY. I think the interpretation of the act by its administrator and by the President has been very fair, and I think the interpretation there presented would be generally accepted. The exception taken to it in the past is the use of the word "company union", which is one of those weasel words, the meaning of which varies greatly with the one who uses it. To one it means any organization which is not a labor union but represents an agreement between a company and its employees; to others it means an organization organized by the company, dominated by the company, carried on by the company under the pretense that it represents the will of the workers where, in fact, it does not.

I have no knowledge of such an organization and I know of no one in our group who has.

The CHAIRMAN. I have no more questions. Has any member of the committee any questions?

Senator WAGNER. I wanted to ask you, Mr. Emery, you read the last Executive order which the President issued in which he directed the Labor Board to hold elections of workers to elect representatives of their own choosing whenever a substantial number in a particular company desired it, and that those representatives were then to represent all those who participated in the election or were eligible to participate? Now, is that contrary to the philosophy of this legislation?

Mr. EMERY. You are speaking of the order of February 1, are you not?

Senator WAGNER. I do not remember the date, but the order provides for the holding of elections.

Mr. EMERY. That is the order of February 1; yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Are you in accord with that?

Mr. EMERY. I am in accord with that order as it has been interpreted by the Administrator and his general counsel but I am not in accord with the order as it has been interpreted by your Board.

Senator WAGNER. Read the language; we can all make interpretations.

Mr. EMERY. Sure.

Senator WAGNER. But the language of it is very clear, is it not?

Mr. EMERY. The language is very clear. It is so clear that the Labor Board has one interpretation and the Administrator charged with the responsibility of the act has another.

Senator WAGNER. Read the language. Does it not say——

Mr. EMERY. I accept the interpretation of the general counsel and his Administrator who is charged with the administration of the act.

Senator WAGNER. Do you mind reading the language of it; just what the language of the order is?

Mr. EMERY. I will, sir. It is a very long order.

Senator WAGNER. I mean that portion of it which deals with the election and what the representatives are then authorized to do.

Mr. EMERY (reading):

1. Whenever the National Labor Board shall determine, in such manner as it sees fit, that a substantial number (as defined in the discretion of the Board)——

I am speaking of the order of February 1.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. EMERY (reading):

1. Whenever the National Labor Board shall determine, in such manner as it sees fit, that a substantial number (as defined in the discretion of the Board) of the employees, or any specific group of employees, of any plant or enterprise or industrial unit of any employer subject to such a code or agreement, have requested the Board to conduct an election to enable them to choose representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection in the exercise of the rights assured to them in said section 7 (a), the Board shall make the arrangements for and supervise the conduct of an election, under the exclusive control of the Board and under such rules and regulations as the Board shall prescribe. Thereafter the Board shall publish promptly the names of those representatives who are selected by the vote of at least a majority of the employees voting, and have been thereby designated to represent all the employees eligible to participate in such an election for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection in their relations with their employer.

That is it, sir. Now, I hold before me here the statement of General Johnson and Donald Richberg, his general counsel, under date of February 4, interpreting it——

The CHAIRMAN. Will you insert that in the record?

Mr. EMERY. I will. We accept that interpretation.

(The statement referred to by Mr. Emery is as follows:)

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION

Release No. 3125

FEBRUARY 4, 1934.

National Recovery Administrator Hugh S. Johnson and Donald R. Richberg, the Administration's general counsel, today issued the following joint statement:

"Because of an erroneous press interpretation issued yesterday of the Executive order of the President which empowered the National Labor Board to supervise the conduct of elections to determine employee representation in certain cases, it is desirable to explain what is and what is not covered by the Executive order

"1. The Executive order provides a method whereby any specific group of employees or all the employees of a plant or of one employer may select, by a majority vote, representatives clearly empowered to act for the majority in their relations with their employer.

"2. This selection of majority representatives does not restrict or qualify in any way the right of minority groups of employees or of individual employees to deal with their employer.

"3. Section 7 (a) affirms the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; and such concerted activities can be lawfully carried on by either majority or minority groups, organizing and selecting such representatives in such manner as they see fit. Also, in affirming this right of collective action the law lays no limitation upon individual action.

"4. The joint statement issued by the Administrator and the General Counsel on August 24, 1933, concerning section 7 (a) provided an interpretation of the section, which has not been changed and is not modified by the Executive order.

"5. The purpose of the Executive order is to provide a definite workable method for the selection by the majority of any group of employees of their representatives who will thereupon be entitled to recognition as the representatives of the will of the majority of the employees eligible to join in that selection.

"6. As a practical proposition the National Labor Board would find it impossible to deal with every controversy that might arise between rival groups of employees, each seeking to represent a fraction of employee opinion, or to conduct thousands of elections so that every little group of employees could select representatives to represent every fraction of employee opinion. Nor could any employer maintain satisfactory relations with his employees through unlimited negotiations with an indefinite number of employee representatives expressing every possible variety of opinion. The most important question to be solved in carrying out the purposes of section 7 (a) is to determine who are the representatives of the majority of the employees affected. It is for the purpose of solving that problem that the Executive order was issued, which in no way excludes the exercise of right by minorities or individuals.

"7. As has been pointed out frequently the right of collective bargaining is not the right to obtain a specific contract, because a contract must be the result of an agreement, and neither employees nor employers can be compelled to enter into a specific contract. But it is to be assumed that if both employer and employees are assured that the representatives of the employees have been selected freely and without coercion to represent the desires of a majority of those affected, then any contract resulting from such collective bargaining will stabilize employment conditions and produce the most satisfactory relations possible between employer and employees.

"8. Insofar as the statement in the press release might be read as saying that employees' representatives in all company unions are chosen by employers it was not so intended as there is no evidence that such is the case. Nor is it true that employees if permitted to act in their own free choice, may not select a company union (meaning local plant union). The principal purpose of the order was to insure that the choice be free—not to influence the choice between any particular form of employee organization.

"HUGH S. JOHNSON,
"Administrator for National Recovery.
"DONALD R. RICHBERG,
"General Counsel."

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you, Mr. Emery.

(The citations referred to by Mr. Emery in his statement are as follows:)

SENATE BILL 2926

According to its declared purpose the Wagner Bill (S. 2926) is designed to equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, and to encourage the amicable settlement of labor disputes. The constitutional theory relied upon to promote these ends if the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. We submit that the power to regulate commerce granted to Congress by article I, section 8, of the Constitution will not sustain this proposed legislation.

ARGUMENT

The power to regulate commerce among the several States gives Congress no power to regulate business essentially local in character. Interstate commerce does not include transactions wholly internal within a State. Consequently, the production of commodities, regardless of their ultimate disposition, has uniformly been held not a part of interstate commerce. According to a recent utterance of the Supreme Court, in Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost (286 U.S. 165, 181):

"Commerce does not begin until manufacturing is finished, and hence the commerce clause of the Constitution does not prevent the State from exercising exclusive control over the manufacture."

See also Heisler v. Thomas Collieries Co. (260 U.S. 245); Coe v. Errol (116 U.S. 517); United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U.S. 344).

Contracts of employment and the relationship of master and servant incident to the manufacturing process are not part of interstate commerce.

Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Ry. Co. v. Yurkonis (238 U.S. 439); Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U.S. 251).

Nor does the fact that labor conflicts interfere with production, and incidentally interfere with the movement of goods in interstate commerce, bring manufacturing within the scope of the Federal power.

United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U.S. 344); United Leather Workers v. Herkert (265 U.S. 457).

Unless an effective conspiracy exists for the primary purpose of restraining trade, the burden on interstate commerce resulting from disputes over conditions of employment is indirect.

Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers (268 U.S. 295); United Leather Workers v. Herkert, supra.

The basis for excluding from the operation of the antitrust acts such incidental burdens on interstate commerce is clearly stated by the Supreme Court in 268 U.S. 64, at page 82, Industrial Association v. United States:

"The alleged conspiracy and the facts here complained of, spent their intended and direct force upon a local situation—for building is as essentially local as mining, manufacturing, or growing crops—and if, by a resulting diminution of the commercial demand, interstate trade was curtailed either generally or in specific instances, that was a fortuitous consequence so remote and indirect as plainly to cause it to fall outside the reach of the Sherman Act."

The conclusion is inevitable, therefore, that bona-fide labor disputes do not burden interstate commerce to an extent justifying their regulation by Congress.

The proposed legislation, however, purports to view commerce as one current in which conditions affecting manufacture are interrelated. This concept of interstate commerce has permitted the extension of Federal power over intrastate railroads, stockyards, and commodity exchanges.

Houston, E. & W. T. Ry. Co. v. U.S. (234 U.S. 342); Stafford v. Wallace (258 U.S. 495); Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U.S. 1).

This concept of commerce on a national scale, however, is limited as pointed out by the Court in United Leather Workers v. Herkert, supra, after reviewing the cases above cited:

"None of these cases, although they all illustrate the practical conception of interstate commerce as a flowing stream from one State to another formed by a regular course of business, can properly be said to support the argument that mere intentional cutting down of manufacture or production is a direct restraint of commerce."

Indeed, even in the most nationalized of our industries, railroads, the power of Congress has been restricted with respect to employment contracts.

Adair v. U.S. (208 U.S. 161).

If the power of Congress in this broad field is limited by the Constitution, Congress certainly did not derive from that same grant an even broader control over industries primarily local. It must be concluded, therefore, that Congress has no constitutional authority to empower a national labor board "to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice that burdens or affects commerce or obstructs the free flow of commerce, or has led or tends to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce."

II

Not only is this proposed legislation beyond the scope of the commerce power, it also impinges on fundamental rights guaranteed by the fifth amendment.

1. The prohibitions contained in section 5 of the bill, and the abrogations of contracts resulting from section 304 (b), unduly restrict that liberty of contract protected by the fifth amendment.

Adair v. U.S., supra; Adkins v. Childrens Hospital (245 U.S. 229).

Although liberty of contract is not inviolate, nevertheless its protection is the rule. This liberty can be restrained only in the exercise of a paramount police power acting in the public interest.

Frisbie v. U.S. (157 U.S. 160); Second Employers' Liability cases (223 U.S. 1).

In those cases the power of Congress could not reasonably be disputed, but the subject-matter sought to be regulated in the Wagner bill is not within the power conferred upon Congress. It follows that, since there is no power to regulate the contract of employment by imposing restrictions upon its exercise, there is no power to abrogate contracts already made.

2. The settlement of disputes between employers and employees is necessarily a judicial determination. By withdrawing such controversies from the courts and submitting the determination of private rights to the National Labor Board, the Wagner bill deprives the parties concerned of that due process of law guaranteed by the fifth amendment.

(a) Jurisdiction, the right to declare the law, is the foundation of due process. In the words of Chief Justice Marshall, in Rose v. Himely (4 Cranch 241):

"It is not easy to conceive a power to execute a municipal law, or to enforce obedience to that law without the circle in which that law operates."

These words are peculiarly in point when, as in the Wagner bill, Congress seeks to extend its legislative authority beyond the limits of its power.

(b) That the power conferred upon the National Labor Board is "judicial", cannot be denied. The determination of rights and duties of employers and employees involves the adjudication of private rights, and in Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. (18 Howard, 272, 284), the Court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Curtis:

"* * * we think it proper to state that we do not consider Congress can either withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which, from its nature, is the subject of a suit at the common law, or in equity, or in admiralty; nor on the other hand, can it bring under the judicial power a matter, which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination."

Even assuming, therefore, that the power of Congress over interstate commerce extends to a regulation of local-employment contracts, the Wagner bill comes in direct conflict with the fifth amendment. This conflict is treated at considerable length in the case of Crowell v. Benson (285 U.S. 22, 56, 57):

"In relation to these basic facts, the question is not the ordinary one as to the propriety of provision for administrative determinations. Nor have we simply the question of due process in relation to notice and hearing. It is rather a question of the appropriate maintenance of the Federal judicial power in requiring the observance of constitutional restrictions. It is the question whether the Congress may substitute for constitutional courts, in which the judicial power of the United States is vested, and administrative agency—in this instance a single deputy commissioner—for the final determination of the existence of the facts upon which the enforcement of the constitutional rights of the citizen depend. The recognition of the utility and convenience of administrative agencies for the investigation and finding of facts within their proper province, and the support of their authorized action, does not require the conclusion that there is no limitation of their use, and that the Congress could completely oust the courts of all determinations of fact by vesting the authority to make them with finality in its own instrumentalities or in the executive department. That would be to sap the judicial power as it exists under the Federal Constitution, and to establish a government of a bureaucratic character alien to our system, wherever fundamental rights depend, as not infrequently they do depend, upon the facts, and finality as to facts becomes in effect finality in law."

In the case of Crowell v. Benson, supra, the statute was sustained only because the Court construed it to permit a trial de novo on the facts. The Wagner bill, however, will not admit of such construction. By limiting review in the courts to the record before the Board, and by giving finality to findings of fact supported by any evidence, the bill strikes at the very substance of due process of law.

(c) The legislation is equally defective in the formal procedure provided before the Board. A Board member may act as prosecutor and judge in the same controversy. The Board is not bound by rules of evidence prevailing in judicial proceedings. It is not required to give reasonable notice of its hearings. The Board's complaint may be changed at any time without affording the employer an opportunity to prepare a defense. Finally, the hearing itself is not in accordance with the requirements of due process. Section 205 (c) permits the Board to issue an order based solely on the examiner's report. The bill gives no right to be heard by the Board itself. A procedure which deprives an employer of liberty and property without notice of the charge or claim against him, and without granting an opportunity to be heard, by those who decide his rights, is clearly opposed to fundamental principles of due process of law.

Louisville & Nashville Ry. v. Schmidt (177 U.S. 230); Londoner v. Denver, 210 U.S. 373.

3. Section 5 of the bill, by exacting obedience to rules which are vague and indefinite, violates an essential requirement of the fifth amendment.

U.S. v. Cohen Grocery Co. (255 U.S. 81); Connally v. General Construction Co. (269 U.S. 385); U.S. v. Penna. Ry. Co. (242 U.S. 208).

An ascertainable standard of conduct to which it is possible to conform is an essential element in due process. In United States v. Cohen Grocery Co., supra, it was held that the Food Control Act of 1917, which provided that it should be unlawful "to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries", did not establish any ascertainable standard of guilt nor inform accused persons of the nature and cause of the accusation against them. In substance it "penalized and punished all acts detrimental to the public interest when unjust and unreasonable in the estimation of the court and jury." Such a statute is repugnant to the due process clause of the Constitution.

Nor is this requirement confined to criminal statutes.

Cline v. Frink Dairy Co. (274 U.S. 445); A. B. Small Co. v. Am. Sug. Ref. Co. (267 U.S. 233, 239).

In the latter case, after reviewing the cases involving the Lever Act, the Court said:

"It was not the criminal penalty that was held invalid, but the exaction of obediance to a rule or standard which was so vague and indefinite as really to be no rule at all."

Section 5 of this bill is particularly obnoxious in this respect. The affirmative duties imposed on employers, as well as the restrictions on their relations with employees, are couched in general language too broad to guide the business man in his daily activities. The phrase beginning "every reasonable effort" in paragraph 2, and "any discriminatory practice" in paragraph 6, when construed with the proviso directly following, are peculiarly objectionable. In effect an employer is compelled to deal with employees and labor problems at his peril. Such hardship is a fundamental evil sought to be condemned by the fifth amendment.

4. The proposed legislation purports to eliminate alleged burdens on interstate commerce created by industrial conflict. From a most casual reading of the bill, however, it is apparent that its primary purpose is to encourage the unionization of labor. It is not designed to foster industrial peace. By excluding strike breakers from its definition of the term "employee", it discriminates against a large class of labor. By failing to impose any restrictions on labor organizations in their negotiations and dealings with employers, it reaches only one element in the cause of industrial strife. Laws which operate arbitrarily or unequally are inconsistent with due process. In Giozza v. Tiernan (1893) (148 U.S. 657), the Court said:

"Due process of law within the meaning of the amendment is secured if the laws operate on all alike and do not subject the individual to an arbitrary exercise of the powers of government."

It is class legislation in its most pernicious form and bears not even a remote connection with promoting the uninterrupted flow of interstate commerce.

The words of Chief Justice Marshall, in McCullough v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 424), and reiterated by the Court in Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co. (259 U.S. 20), are strikingly in point:

"Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution, or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land."

See also Hill v. Wallace (259 U.S. 44); Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U.S. 373); Peoples Petroleum Producers v. Smith (1 Fed. Supp. 363).

The conclusion is inevitable, therefore, that this proposed legislation is arbitrarily designed to regulate employment conditions over which Congress has no control. It embodies a regulation of interstate commerce only in name.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dennison, will you come forward, please? We were unable to hear Mr. Dennison last week. Mr. Dennison has some suggested changes to recommend to the committee in the pending bill.

STATEMENT OF HENRY S. DENNISON

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give us your full name?

Mr. DENNISON. Henry S. Dennison; Dennison Manufacturing Co., Framingham, Mass.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you now in Washington engaged in some public work?

Mr. DENNISON. Most of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Just what is your position here?

Mr. DENNISON. I am on the Industrial Advisory Board of the N.R.A., and a member of the National Labor Board, a very new member of the National Labor Board.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity on the National Labor Board, as representative of labor or industry?

Mr. DENNISON. Industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Your manufacturing plant, the Dennison Manufacturing Co., is located in Framingham, Mass.?

Mr. DENNISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you manufacture?

Mr. DENNISON. Stationers supplies, printed paper goods, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees have you?

Mr. DENNISON. About 2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. DENNISON. If I may, I would also like to speak for Mr. Leeds, of Leeds & Northrup, who was also to appear, and it will save your time, because what I have to say is practically his own views.

Senator WAGNER. He is also an employer of labor?

Mr. DENNISON. Yes, sir.

Senator DAVIS. Is Mr. Leeds a member of the National Labor Board?

Mr. DENNISON. He is not; he is a member of the Labor Advisory Board.

I shall confine myself to section 5, paragraphs 3 and 4. I suggest eliminating these paragraphs and depending on paragraph 1 and the progressive interpretations of subversive and nonsubversive practices which will come from the Board's decisions, because I am convinced, and for many years have believed, that employee representation is an essential supplementary and a necessary competing type of unionism, if the final structure of organization of employees is to reach workable form.

I am not against unionism as typified by many A. F. of L. and other unions, and am no recent convert. I am a firm believer in the necessity of the growth of such unions. But I am against forcing their growth, as this bill as it now stands tends to do, and at a pace which makes sound and socially wholesome development very unlikely, and which may, therefore, lead to a possibly fatal collapse of such unionism.

The CHAIRMAN. Are your employees organized?

Mr. DENNISON. Only such as have crafts for them.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no company union?

Mr. DENNISON. We have employee representation and have had since 1919. We have not called it a company union because we did not like the flavor of the word as it grew up shortly after the war.

The CHAIRMAN. What form of company representation? How do they select their representatives?

Mr. DENNISON. The employees' representatives constitute a council elected by them, set up by themselves independently, and dealing with management through joint committees or in any other way they may see fit on all the subjects that we have to deal with.

The CHAIRMAN. How often do they meet?

Mr. DENNISON. They meet regularly once every 2 weeks, the executive committee does, but there are meetings as often as circumstances require, as they think they need them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any regular yearly or annual election?

Mr. DENNISON. Yes; an annual election in December.

They are subdivided into divisional committees for detailed work and joined by an executive committee of eight, and the council as a whole acts on such matters as interest the whole plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you understand that there are any provisions in this bill that would prevent you from carrying on the present relationship that you have with your employees?

Mr. DENNISON. The only way that we can read paragraphs 3 and 4 would seem to say that they could not meet during hours unless their wages were deducted. That is, we are making a payment to them virtually for their meeting on company time. As a matter of fact, we want them to do so and they want to do so because we are dealing with daily business and they are taking their part in it.

This has been in existence so long that there is no question of our starting such a thing; it began in 1919, but in both those paragraphs I believe it would be impossible to carry on in the form we have now.

Senator BORAH. Your organization is really a company union, is it not?

Mr. DENNISON. It is a company union, if that term—it is difficult to define it. They have no dues, for example; there are no requirements and never have been to join; there is really nothing to joining; you vote once a year if you wish to for this representative committee, and one does not know who votes and who does not. Usually a very large majority vote but it is really straining words to call it a union.

The CHAIRMAN. Aren't there any bylaws?

Mr. DENNISON. Yes; there is a structure, just the form of election and how committees should be related. It is a fairly simple set of bylaws.

Senator DAVIS. You have a plan of unemployment insurance?

Mr. DENNISON. A plan instituted for unemployment relief; it is not strictly insurance. We started it in 1915 and that had to be suspended. The employees wished to suspend it before the funds entirely ran out during the last depression.

Presumably it will be taken up again as soon as conditions allow.

The CHAIRMAN. Still in suspension?

Mr. DENNISON. Still in suspension; yes. There is a small sum left which they apparently prefer to leave, I suppose as a nest egg.

I am against one big union, the growth of which is surely here invited, because no single system of labor or other organization can be sufficient to cope with the complexities of a modern industrial civilization.

May I remind you that, usually unwisely, but, nevertheless actually, millions of working men and women in the United States are as much or more afraid of the A.F. of L. than are thousands of employers. Such deep-rooted fears are no basis upon which we can force the growth of a single form of unionism and have the slightest hope of success.

As to the attitude and practices of many employers, I have no illusions. I have fought these practices too long for that. I can understand and appreciate Senator Wagner's natural desire, arising out of his inestimable service on the Labor Board, to use a scalpel on them. But by virtue of its task, that Board saw chiefly the bad and some of the worst cases. There are hundreds of companies in which a sound system of joint and mutual participation in management has developed or is developing. These had no quarrels to bring to a Labor Board.

For similar reasons union leaders get to know many more of the unsound and vicious cases than of the sound ones.

Even if few, these companies who have established a basis for wholesome mutual business relationships between management and workers should be cultivated as seeding ground or laboratories from which we may learn, not dug up with the tares by these two paragraphs.

I know that if these two paragraphs are stricken out there will remain more so-called "company unions" under the employer's thumb than if they are left in. But my firm conviction is that under today's conditions, this evil will be short-lived, whereas the evils of forcing the growth of outside unions beyond the rate at which capable leaders can be discovered and can gain experience will last a generation. In few if any plans can a hog-tied company union survive more than a year or two; they either evolve into true and independent employee representation or blow up and reform into stiff and often antagonistic unions controlled from without. But a sufficient number of new unions unskillfully led—and union leadership is one of the most highly skilled of the arts—will lead to enough fool trouble, bitter strife, and bloodshed to set the whole country blindly against unionism in any form.

We must not forget, also, that the influences set up by this bill must apply themselves to the more than 90 percent of industrial establishments in this country which have less than 100 employees. To cramp all systematic contact in these plants, as this bill cramps it, is a proposal to be considered most carefully.

You are acting here not for the short but for the long pull, and in your eagerness to cure immediate ills cannot take too much risk of building up our industrial system into two armed camps—labor and management—always on the defensive and some time certain to adopt the German dictum that offense is the most effective form of defense.

It is possible, of course, that unionism, if thus forced in growth and limited to the single separatist form might become dominant in the overall management of the industrial structure. It has approached that point in England and if it should consolidate politically might do so here. Personally, I think that unlikely, but do not think it unwise to take some account of the chances and of the new sort of trouble which would arise out of the economic rigidities it would bring.

Much as I look forward to and favor the wider range of classical unionism in this country, I cannot overlook the flat fact that it is not unionism but the abilities of union leaders which determines whether unionism shall be of net service or disservice to workers and to the country. And this determination rests not nearly so much upon the abilities of the national union leaders as upon the local men who make the thousands of practical contacts where the work actually goes on. Theirs is a very exacting job requiring a combination of gifts rare among humans. We must remember the certain fact that we employers do not deal with Mr. Green. If in the past years all of us could have done so our attitude would be very different today.

I am deeply, and through many years of conviction, in favor of the establishment of a labor board. I do not want to have its long-run success jeopardized by attempting too much success at first.

I am equally deeply convinced that employee representation, so built as to afford the maximum of mutual contact and participation inconsistent with full independnce, is invaluable as a supplement to outside unionism. I believe that out of their slowly freeing competition and the gradual comparison of the two forms we shall be able to develop modifications of each which will tend toward making possible the realization into actuality of the truth that any business organization which can knit itself into a single organism will prove superior as an institution of broad social value, to one which must exist in two somewhat stiffly cooperating and sometimes actively conflicting segments.

What has been a dream so far, has in 1933 entered the realms of the barely possible. To eliminate all chances of organized contact, as do paragraphs 3 and 4, takes the knife and at once cuts away much present evil, but leaves to the patient no chance of wholeness. I urge you to take risks, but the lesser risks, for what seems to me incomparably the greater chances of health; to choose to allow some present evils to continue for a time, rather than to root them out at the cost of all reasonable chances to increase the number of ably led unions at the complete sacrifice of all honest and mutually acceptable systems of employee representation.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Dennison, outside of the criticism of the provisions to which you refer, have you any views about the remainder of the proposed act?

Mr. DENNISON. In general I am very much in favor of the whole act except for those two paragraphs.

Senator WAGNER. So that if the amendments you suggest were made, you would heartily favor the legislation?

Mr. DENNISON. I should.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. Mr. Gadsden, Mr. Edmonds; you are both here representing the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce?

STATEMENT OF PHILLIP H. GADSDEN

Mr. GADSDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am Philip H. Gadsden, of Philadelphia. I am president of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce. I am here with a committee from the chamber, and Mr. Edmonds is our general counsel who will present our views.

STATEMENT OF FRANKLIN S. EDMONDS

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Edmonds, will you give us your full name?

Mr. EDMONDS. My name is Franklin S. Edmonds, of Philadelphia, Pa., and I appear as general counsel for the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, which is an organization of about 5,000 members.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that our organization has been in hearty sympathy with the N.R.A. legislation. We made it welcome in our offices and by September of 1933 we had more than 99 percent of the industrial establishments of Philadelphia under the President's temporary code. We have a record of complete consistency in support of the general policy of what Congress has been trying to accomplish.

We have listened this morning to the excellent argument of Mr. Emery on the legal phases of this and it has taken a certain part of my thunder. I do not propose to repeat that, sir, and I assume it will not be necessary.

There are three things I would like to say to the members of the committee. In the first place, we feel that these bypartisan courts do not work out satisfactorily and we would like to emphasize Mr. Emery's argument that a court that consists of two representatives of employers and two of employees, and three representing the public is not the kind of a court that can function most efficiently in a problem of this kind.

We have noticed, for instance, that in the court over which Senator Wagner presides the industrialists are frequently absent. It is difficult to get men from business and have them take the time that is necessary even though their appointment might be for a year.

Senator WAGNER. May I say that that happened very infrequently, but in view of some things that have been said I wanted to emphasize that outside of, I think, one decision made by the Board, the decision was unanimous, the representatives of industry like Mr. Swope, Mr. Teagle, Mr. Kirstein, and Mr. du Pont, joined in the conclusions reached by the Board. I wanted to have that statement made about the activities of the Board corrected. I think it is two instances, and the decision of the Board has been unanimous.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think it must have been one of those decisions which came from Philadelphia in which the industrialists were absent at the time. I have heard Mr. Budd make the statement and I have no doubt it is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The industrialists joined in the decision.

Mr. EDMONDS. Let us raise the question whether this is the right way to get at the problem. I noticed with interest in Australia where they adopted a labor court they put a high judge at the top of it, a single man, a man who is accustomed to declaring rights and understands rights, and for 14 years from 1907 to 1921 Chief Justice Higgins presided over that court with a trained mind, weighing rights. Frankly, that is what this court has got to do, and we do not think it is likely to be so satisfactory a representative of the public interest if it becomes a matter of balancing one side against the other. It would be much better to have a permanent commission composed of a group who represent the public, for a long term of service, in order that they may gradually build up a tradition of rights which is what is needed here.

Senator WAGNER. I might remind the chairman that the proponents of the bill, who appear in favor of the legislation, generally also favor that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. I stated that when Mr. Emery was making comment of the same character, that even the proponents of the bill have favored a commission representing entirely the public rather than representing the employees and employers.

Mr. EDMONDS. Then we have no quarrel on that and I will pass to my next subject.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not agreed on it yet, but it is under consideration, and the argument is the same on both sides.

Mr. EDMONDS. The next subject I want to speak about particularly—Senator Wagner, I would not be here today if I had not heard you on the radio Sunday afternoon. I understood you to say that the company union was essentially dishonest.

Senator WAGNER. You could not have listened with great care.

Mr. EDMONDS. I thought I did.

Senator WAGNER. I emphasized the word "dominated."

Mr. EDMONDS. Then, sir, I am very glad to accept that point of view now but it is not what I understood you to say.

Senator WAGNER. Wherever I have spoken—somehow or other the statement has not been accurately reported. I have always used the word "dominated" wherever I have spoken. I can understand that there can be an independent union within a plant so long as it is the free choice of the men.

That is what I am interested in. Whatever the men want to do, if they want to bargain individually, or through an organization within a plant, that is all right, only if it is the free choice of the men. Of course, we are all for that. That is all I am seeking to do, to make the worker a free man to make his choice, and I think that I have been emphasizing that. I think that the chairman will agree with me that whenever I have mentioned it here, I have emphasized "company-dominated union."

Mr. EDMONDS. I will give you a clipping from the New York Times of last Sunday, and I would suggest that you write to them. They have usually been most accurate in their quotations, and it seems to me that your statement as reported here is too sweeping to be true.

Senator WAGNER. I agree with you and, if you will do me the honor of reading the article which I wrote for the New York Times several weeks before, I emphasized that I was opposing the company-dominated union and that I had, of course, no objection to the company union if it is the free choice of the workers.

Mr. EDMONDS. Very good, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner has repeatedly before the committee and repeatedly in private conversations with me expressed regret that the press should always insist upon reporting him as being opposed to company unions. I have every reason to believe he entertains no such view.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am very glad to hear it.

Senator WAGNER. The free choice of the worker is the only thing I am interested in.

Mr. EDMONDS. I want to call attention to the development of this company-union idea. Filene of Boston, Mr. Dennison, who has been here this morning. Leeds & Northrup, Philadelphia, and others—in Philadelphia the movement, curiously enough, came from the Society of Friends, which some years ago appointed a committee on social justice as between employer and employee. The Leeds & Northrup Association has two of the employees here today, who are hoping for a chance to be heard here.

My feeling is that these associations are among the most important developments we have had during the whole of this period, and I say it would be extremely dangerous for the United States if those associations which are honest—like the Senator, I have no sympathy with those that are dishonest—but if you put the quietus on those which are honest, you are stopping one of the most helpful agencies at the present time.

Senator WAGNER. I assure you, Mr. Edmonds, I am the last man who wants to do that. All I am interested in is to have the worker make a living.

Mr. EDMONDS. I agree with you, Senator; I think the language in the bill is very strict.

Senator WAGNER. I am not wedded to language. It is the objective that I seek. If better language can be proposed, I am not adamant.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the whole trouble with this bill is that it scares everybody on the other side. I don't think that anybody is scared of leaving the matter to you, but in the N.R.A. there are at times interpretations of restraints and coercion.

I am an employer of labor. I have 20 clerks in my office. Under this act, if I say to my secretary that I am inclined to think that one of our office problems should be handled in this way or that way, does that bring me under the curse of the act?

You cannot create crimes in indefinite language and then expect people to be happy under them. My feeling is that there is a great deal here which you do not intend, and I would be glad, if you would revise the bill, to come down and give you my opinion of it then.

Senator WAGNER. We would be very glad to have it.

Mr. EDMONDS. Frankly, this bill impresses me as having been written by a man who had been reading Marx on Class War, and thought all employers and employees were standing in opposite corners making faces at each other, and it is unfair to American industry.

Senator WAGNER. I think if you make a man a free man you bring about a much better relationship than when you keep him under restraint.

Mr. EDMONDS. What do you think happens when you have all the restraint on one side?

Senator WAGNER. It should not be all on one side.

Mr. EDMONDS. It ought not to be; I agree with you, sir.

Let me go to my third point. We are very much interested in this question of industrial recovery, and we ask you to consider one side of this matter before you decide on any legislation on the subject at all, and that is the price level of the country and the effect on it since the N.R.A. legislation, the "new-deal" legislation, began, a year ago.

It is, of course, notorious that since 1929 prices went down. It is equally notorious that manufactured goods and agricultural products did not go down in the same ratio. If there had been a general decline in price levels, conditions could have been readjusted to meet it, but what happened was that manufactured goods went down about 50 percent and agricultural goods went down about 70 or 80 percent, and the result was that in agriculture there was no longer left a consuming power to purchase the manufactured goods. Thus began the depression.

Now, I ask you to consider the fact that in 1933 in February-March there was an upward price movement. That upward price movement was more rapid among agricultural products than it was among manufactured goods, which was as it ought to be; agriculture had gone down further and it ought to have come up more. That continued until July and since July it has not been continuing at all.

The disparity between the agricultural goods and the manufactured goods is greater now, in December 1933, which is the last month for which I have the figures, then it was in July of 1933.

What does that mean? It means that you are getting the price level out of balance again, and the price level is one of the most difficult elements entering into our economic and social life.

We are again finding that something is happening which is decreasing the consuming power of one large class. I do not want to burden you too much with these figures, but, on the basis of July 1929 as 100, raw materials in July of 1933 were 65.5 and in December of 1933, 65.8. They had gone up 0.3 percent.

Manufactured goods were 76.5 percent in July, and 79.6 in December. They went up 3.1 percent; that is, they have gone up 10 times as rapidly as the raw materials have gone up.

Foods, as a matter of fact, have gone down in that 6-month period, and nonfoods have gone up, and gone up markedly.

Now, I want to say to you gentlemen that this method of correcting the economic situation of the country by pulling upon one string until you get it out of gear with the other strings is harmful to the country, and it is delaying the restoration of general business recovery which is the thing that we all desire.

Senator MURPHY. Yet there has been a tremendous pull on the agricultural string?

Mr. EDMONDS. There is, and what are the facts? The facts are that foods in July were 63.6, and in December 1933, 59.6.

Nonfoods in July 1933 were 77.8 and nonfoods in December 1933 83.7

In spite of all your pulling on foods, foods have gone down 4 points in the 6 months, and nonfoods have gone up 4 points in the same 6 months.

Senator MURPHY. We are glad to have had your view on that point.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am glad to give it.

Senator MURPHY. What is your answer?

Mr. EDMONDS. To this question? My feeling is that the increase in wages which came about under N.R.A. has resulted in increased costs. I am a director in three industrial corporations, and I know in one corporation that in February of 1933 labor costs were 51 percent of our gross. In February of 1934 labor costs were 61 percent of our gross, and in the meantime our business had continued about the same. We happen to have a little surplus, and we are using the surplus in the hope that better times will come, but that can only be continued for a short time.

Senator BORAH. Ordinarily it would seem that if you increased wages you would increase purchasing power?

Mr. EDMONDS. You are increasing the purchasing power for one group only.

Senator BORAH. It is a very large group, and ought to have its effect upon foods.

Mr. EDMONDS. It ought to have its effect upon foods, but it is not having it because there is still that over-plus.

Senator BORAH. There is a reason here, I think. Some of these prices here have been raised which are not founded upon sound economics, but ordinarily you would have to admit that one way to restore purchasing power is to increase wages throughout the country.

Mr. EDMONDS. If you could apply that in all lines of employment, and take in your 10,000,000 unemployed, you probably would be right.

Senator BORAH. You never can raise prices and hold them there without distributing the purchasing power and restoring it, and one way of doing it is to increase wages.

The CHAIRMAN. For your information, Senator, in your absence from the committee testimony was presented here that while there had been an increase of 25 to 30 percent in the textile industry, the increased cost of textiles was over 100 percent.

Senator WAGNER. I will not go into that now.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is another side of the question——

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Edmonds, pardon me. I have been summoned to another room, but I will be back in a moment. I did not want you to regard my leaving as a discourtesy.

Mr. EDMONDS. Not at all.

So, I am stating this, that your general policy has sanctioned the wage structure in certain lines of employment. It seems to me now that you ought to give the rest of the country time to overtake that. That is one of the reasons why it seems to us that this union scheme will interfere with the stability that is necessary in order that these other clauses may protect the wage earners in the industrial plants.

That is all I have to say. I thank you for the courtesy you have given me.

Our feeling is very strong that this is a subject on which there should be a great deal of study.

Senator BORAH. Mr. Edmonds, you were speaking about the statement of Senator Wagner with regard to company unions being dishonest.

Of course, Senator Wagner does not think that, and I do not think that any member of the committee does, but we do think unions ought to be unions of the men and not of the companies.

Mr. EDMONDS. We are with you 100 percent on that.

Senator BORAH. You would have no objection to the usual phrasing which would accomplish freedom of action on the part of the men?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; not the slightest. It may and it might be done on the basis that that does not bar all forms of organization except one.

Senator BORAH. I guess we all would agree on that, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you let your table you were reading from go into the record?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and we are going to send to each member of the committee a copy of the statement.

(The communications from the Philadelphia Board of Trade are as follows:)

MARCH 26, 1934.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Under authority of the committees on legislation, foreign and coastwise commerce, and domestic productions, of the executive council of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, in joint session March 26, 1934, the attached statement is presented to you by the undersigned, with the request that the same, as reflecting the sentiment of the board of trade with reference to the proposed enactment of the so-called "Wagner-Connery bill", be included in the record of your committee's hearings.

Thanking you for this courtesy, I am, on behalf of the aforementioned committees,

Very truly yours,

H. W. WILLS, Secretary.

MARCH 2, 1934.

Hon. WM. P. CONNERY, Jr.,
Chairman Committee on Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The executive council of the Philadelphia Board of Trade in session February 19, 1934, authorized the following protest gaainst the proposal to effect any further reduction in the standard working time of employees as proposed in H.R. 7202, for the reason that such policy, if adopted, would prove unwise and economically unsound. The board of trade was actuated in this conclusion by certain facts.

Certain of the heavy industries upon which prosperity is fundamentally dependent already find it difficult to secure the necessary amount of skilled labor to carry on a subnormal volume of business.

If a volume of business equal to that enjoyed in 1926 was at present available it would be impossible for the heavy industries to fulfill such requirements even at the old 54-hour week. This for the reason that since the beginning of the depression many of these skilled workers have passed out of the picture through natural causes or drifted into other fields of work and no replacement has occurred.

It must not be overlooked that the employment of ordinary mechanics and ordinary labor is dependent upon the activities of skilled labor and any reduction in the volume of the latter is immediately reflected in unemployment of the lower grades of labor.

A further reduction of the working week to 30 hours would be fatal to recovery of the heavy industries and as no general prosperity can exist without prosperity in this class of industry, such a reduction of working hours would be reflected on all industry, thereby tending to retard rather than assist general recovery.

The National Industrial Conference Board in January, 1934, made an employment survey which indicated that if average employment were continued at the 1929 level, approximately 9,000,000 wage earners would now be gainfully employed. At the business level of October 1933, with workers averaging 35.8 hours per week, there would be 2,314,000 unemployed. If the working hours were reduced to 30 per week, unemployment would be theoretically reduced by 1,293,000 persons, leaving more than 1,000,000 still unemployed.

Average hours per week would have to shrink 26.6 to take up theoretically all the slack in manufacturing industry. In July 1933, the average hourly wage was 42.7 cents; in October 1933, this wage averaged 52.5 cents. If the working week were reduced to 30 hours, the hourly rate would rise to 62.7 cents, if the total pay per week remained the same. The conference board pointed out that as industry is evidently operating on a very narrow margin of profit it cannot bear increased labor costs without advancing the price of its product. Increased prices have already made it difficult to maintain the sale of the product.

The National Industrial Conference Board prepared a chart giving manufacturing changes from 1923–33. The study upon which the chart was based shows that after July with the higher wage rates imposed by the Government policy that labor costs increased per man-hour; curtailment of hours lessened efficiency of plant operation; introduction of new workers lowered average efficiency of the employees; and as a result labor cost per unit of production rose, while total production decreased. From July 1933, to the end of the year, prices of finished manufactures rose 3.6 percent, labor costs per man-hour 25.5 percent, labor costs per unit of product 54.3 percent, and labor costs in relation to manufacturers' gross income 48.8 percent. On the other hand production declined 30.9 percent.

A further reduction of weekly working hours by increasing costs to a point which may smother the slowly gathering wave of advancing business would defeat the very purpose of this act, if it may be assumed that such purpose is to decrease unemployment.

It is the sense of the executive council of the Philadelphia Board of Trade that the United States Government should withdraw from the direct control of industrial and commercial activity as expeditiously as prevailing conditions make advisable, for the reason that unwise persistence in standardizing methods, such as that proposed under the 30-hour week plan, tend to stifle rather than encourage the returning individual initiative and commercial enterprise which, under natural improvement of domestic and international economic conditions, is now asserting itself.

I am, on behalf of the executive council of the Philadelphia Board of Trade,

Very truly yours,

H. W. WILLS, Secretary.

In addition to the foregoing, the following telegram was dispatched to the President of the United States, under date of March 17, 1934, as reflecting the sentiment of the Philadelphia Board of Trade:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C.

We ask your careful consideration of the want of confidence, even fear, now pervading the minds particularly of the owners of heavy industries over threatened shortening of hours of labor. Catering to labor organizations evidences to employers threatened monopoly by organized labor. Investigations of capitalists and employers, but no investigations of labor unions (not incorporated) salaries paid or distribution of their millions of dollars of income suggests prejudicial attitude. The N.R.A. has been helpful but not the sole cause of increased business which now wishes a chance to adjust itself and go ahead with Federal assistance rather than despite Governmental bureaucratic interference.

THE PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE, PHILIP GODLEY, President.

Senator DAVIS. I would like to put into the record this letter from the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Davis wishes to put into the record a communication from the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

MARCH 21, 1934.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Senate Committee on Education and Labor,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: May we call your attention to the attached copy of a declaration concerning the Wagner bill now pending in Congress, and ask your kind consideration of our views on this legislation?

This declaration was unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce at their regular meeting yesterday, March 20.

Very truly yours,

FRANK C. HARPER,
Secretary-Manager.

The Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, which on the day of President Roosevelt's inauguration sent him a message of good will and a pledge of heartiest cooperation in all measures facilitating national recovery, and which has redeemed that pledge by unflagging efforts to make the N.R.A. program effective in Pittsburgh, deplores every attempt to pervert the instrumentalities of recovery and use them for the selfish advantage of any particular class or group and the detriment of the people as a whole.

While unwavering in its loyalty to the fundamental purpose of the recovery movement, the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce confesses that such outgrowths of the movement as the Wagner bill now pending in Congress give it the gravest solicitude.

That bill is frankly subversive of the whole spirit of the original recovery legislation. Under cover of the provisions for collective bargaining in section 7 (a) of the N.I.R.A. a professional group of labor agitators are undertaking with the aid of Senator Wagner, chairman of the National Labor Board, to compel the great free majority of American workingmen to join a labor federation which they have never been willing to join of their own accord, and the professional leaders of which are endeavoring to make themselves masters of a labor monopoly with unprecedented powers tantamount to dictatorship over all American labor and industry.

Persistence in the efforts to force the Wagner bill through Congress will unquestionably jeopardize the whole recovery objective, raising possibilities of disorder of far-reaching and disastrous proportions. The free workingmen of America, no less than their employers, view with deep concern this tragically unfortunate complication, and the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce trusts President Roosevelt will bring his great influence to bear at once upon the forces involved to make it clear not only to Congress but to the country that he has no sympathy with any attempt, no matter by whom sponsored, to degrade the free collective bargaining between employers and employees stipulated in the original recovery act into an utterly unprecedented labor tyranny which could end only in bitter conflict and ultimate catastrophe.

This declaration is unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce at its meeting on March 20, 1934, and it is hereby ordered that a copy of it be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the members of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and to all of our Representatives in Congress.

Adopted by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, March 20, 1934.

[SEAL] FRANK C. HARPER, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. HIGGINS. I am president of the Worcester Pressed Steel Co., a small manufacturer of steel.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an independent steel company?

Mr. HIGGINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Your plant is located at Worcester?

Mr. HIGGINS. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees have you?

Mr. HIGGINS. Two hundred and fifty, now.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Higgins, we will be glad to get your views in regard to this measure.

Mr. HIGGINS. We are operating under two codes, the steel code and the fabricated iron and steel code, and we are entirely opposed to this bill for reasons which have already been stated.

We are a small steel manufacturer, independent; we have no unions nor company unions, because I or my superintendent or my assistant knows every man by name and by residence. They live in the neighborhood around us.

I would like to state that three quarters of the firms in this country employ 20 men or less, and we are in that large majority group which stands in a serious position if any bill like this is passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a union among your employees?

Mr. HIGGINS. No; we have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Company or otherwise?

Mr. HIGGINS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Your employees all live in the city of Worcester?

Mr. HIGGINS. They do.

The CHAIRMAN. They are not organized?

Mr. HIGGINS. No; they are not.

The CHAIRMAN. Two hundred fifty employees, you said?

Mr. HIGGINS. Yes.

Senator MURPHY. What is your objection to permitting the employees to organize?

Mr. HIGGINS. We have no objection. I began with this company as a worker——

The CHAIRMAN. Is this a family company? Is it a company that you own yourself?

Mr. HIGGINS. I am a stockholder; I am the majority stockholder at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the other stock owned by the general public or by members of your family?

Mr. HIGGINS. By members of my family, and also by others; by employees and by our directors.

The CHAIRMAN. How much is owned by employees?

Mr. HIGGINS. About 10 percent—I guess 20 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Your employees have made no effort to organize at any time?

Mr. HIGGINS. They have not.

The CHAIRMAN. And have shown no inclination to organize?

Mr. HIGGINS. They have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think if this bill were adopted they would be forced to organize?

Mr. HIGGINS. I think they would.

Senator BORAH. I do not understand why they would be forced to organize under this bill. Will you state why?

Mr. HIGGINS. Because of the activities of organized labor which would come into the field as they did in these early years of the war, and at that time there was so much activity that industry was greatly slowed down.

Senator BORAH. What you fear is that outside labor organizations will come in and impose themselves upon your people and compel them to become organized or become members of their organization?

Mr. HIGGINS. That is the result that we expect.

Senator MURPHY. And yet that right is theirs today without that law?

Mr. HIGGINS. Yes, sir; absolutely—and I, as a worker in this small firm, would wish to be represented as a minority worker. I do not think it is right for a few to impose their outside domination on the rest of the independent workers.

Senator MURPHY. You have no objection to a company organization?

Mr. HIGGINS. Absolutely not, to represent those who are members of a company union, but not those who are not.

If this bill goes through, undoubtedly this company will liquidate and, if so, I shall endeavor to get a job. I am a mechanic and a machinist, and I shall endeavor to get a job in a factory where I may be able to bargain individually and independently, if I care to, and I think that superior workers will always be able to bargain independently to their advantage rather than in groups.

Senator MURPHY. But yet they are a very small percentage, the independent workers are a very small percentage of the workers?

Mr. HIGGINS. They are 100 percent in the small industries, in our industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean in the character of steel production that you are engaged in?

Mr. HIGGINS. Yes; in New England.

Senator MURPHY. Every man is a man who can step out and get a job trading independently, offering his services independently, every man in your employ is a specialist who can do that?

Mr. HIGGINS. No. We have suffered very much from unemployment and only the superior men have been able to regain their jobs, and that puts a premium on skill, and I would hope, if I were an independent worker again, to have the opportunity to have the reward of my skill and ability.

The CHAIRMAN. You are paying your men the wages and employing your men the working hours defined in the code for your industry?

Mr. HIGGINS. We are; absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. How many other companies are in this code, the code which you signed?

Mr. HIGGINS. We have two codes; the iron and steel code has many, and I cannot state right off.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the fabricated material that you make?

Mr. HIGGINS. The steel stampings. We roll steel and then we fabricate it into parts for automobiles and other machines.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you in competition with other producers?

Mr. HIGGINS. Yes; very much.

The CHAIRMAN. And under the code you have to agree upon the same rate of wages and the same hours of employment?

Mr. HIGGINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So that there is no plant now making the same products that you are producing that is not giving to its employees the same rate of wages for like work and the same number of hours of employment?

Mr. HIGGINS. I assume that there are not.

Senator MURPHY. You would not feel that it would be obligatory upon you to liquidate your business if company unions were organized?

Mr. HIGGINS. No, we would not.

Senator MURPHY. And if we made it impossible in this law, or sought to make it impossible in this law, for any interference by employers in the organization and conduct of that so-called "company union", would that impel you to want to liquidate?

Mr. HIGGINS. I do not think it is possible for any bill to guarantee life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to any small group of employees at the expense of the majority. I think that this bill undertakes to carry out an impossible class legislation, which would be a great detriment to the large majority of workers.

Senator DAVIS. What materials do you produce?

Mr. HIGGINS. We produce cold-rolled strip steel from billets which we purchase in the Pittsburgh district.

Senator DAVIS. Cold-rolled strip? What gage?

Mr. HIGGINS. From 10 to 250, and down to half-inch strips, and bands to 14 inches wide, and these are fabricated into automobile parts and machine parts which in the old days when we had commodity rates, we shipped all over the country.

Senator DAVIS. What size billets do you use? What weight?

Mr. HIGGINS. Our largest coils as received from the Pittsburgh district would be about 1,000 pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Higgins. We appreciate very much having your views.

The next witnesses represent the workers from Leeds & Northrup Co.: Mr. E. R. Fiske, Jr., and Mr. J. E. Whisler. Will you both come forward?

STATEMENT OF EDWARD R. FISKE, Jr.

The CHAIRMAN. You are both employees of Leeds & Northrup Co., of Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. FISKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the nature of your employment?

Mr. FISKE. We have sent two delegates here, one from the salaried group of employees, and one from the hourly group. I am a salaried employee, and Mr. Whisler is from the hourly group.

The CHAIRMAN. What group?

Mr. FISKE. What we call the hourly group; employees who receive their compensation on an hourly rate rather than a weekly wage. It might also be said that Mr. Whisler is a manual worker, while I am in the office.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a union of employees at Leeds & Northrup Co.?

Mr. FISKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By the way, what do they produce?

Mr. FISKE. Senator, we have reduced our statement to writing, in a very few words. We have a statement which, I think, in as few words as possible, covers the questions you are asking me now.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is in your statement, you may proceed.

Mr. FISKE. Thank you.

We appear before you as representatives of the Cooperative Association of Employees of the Leeds & Northrup Co. To the members of our organization, after having read the Wagner bill and after having heard it discussed by its sponsors, it appears that the effect of the bill would be to legislate our organization out of existence. It is the sense of the members of the association that they wish to continue to function. On the assumption that our understanding of the effect of the bill is correct, our organization has sent us to plead with you that, in some way, provision be made to prevent the destruction of a form of employee representation which, in our experience over a long term of years, has proved entirely satisfactory and adequate.

The Leeds & Northrup Co. manufactures electrical measuring instruments for sicence and industry, and electric heat-treating furnaces. Its factory and headquarters are located at Philadelphia, Pa. On March 1, 1934, it had 606 employees, of whom 330, a little over 50 percent, are compensated on an hourly basis; the remaining 276 employees are on a salary basis. The total number of employees before the depression was well over 1,000.

The Cooperative Association of the Employees of the Leeds & Northrup Co. is an organization composed of all of the employees of that company. It was formed in 1918 and has functioned without interruption since that time. The legislative and executive powers of the association are vested in a council composed of elected representatives. This council represents the employees in all their relations with management. Business considered by council is investigated through the medium of standing and special committees, appointed partially from council and partially from the association at large.

Council considers problems relating to wages, hours, safety, working conditions and any other matters which concern the employees. It deals not only with general company policies which affect all employees, but also with individual grievances. In addition, it supervises the operation of a pension plan, a savings plan, an unemployment relief fund, an educational plan, and an athletic association. It is consistently consulted by management in the development of all policies affecting the employees.

The Cooperative Association is the nucleus of the Leeds & Northrup Co. employee plan which won first award out of over four hundred entries in a Nation-wide contest conducted by Forbes Magazine in 1931.

The above is a brief description of the form of employee representation which we are anxious to continue. We present the following reasons for asking you to amend the bill now before this committee in order to permit its continued existence.

1. We point first to the 16 years during which the employees and management of the Leeds & Northrup Co. have satisfactorily settled all matters pertaining to employee relations. We believe this long record of uninterrupted and effective service is, in itself, sufficient reason to justify the continued existence of our cooperative association.

2. The Wagner bill, as we understand it, would make it impossible for an employee organization dealing with grievances, labor disputes, wages, or hours of employment, to act for the employees in matters relating to general employee welfare. In our case the latter include educational, pension, and unemployment relief plans to which the company contributes financial and other support, and plans for improving working conditions supported by the company.

The CHAIRMAN. You have heard the discussion here this morning in reference to dominated employees' organizations and nondominated employees' organizations, have you?

Mr. FISKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You would not consider your organization as one which was dominated by your employers?

Mr. FISKE. No, sir. I was going to take that up as one of the later points.

The CHAIRMAN. I am inclined to think the Wagner bill would have no effect upon your operation.

Mr. FISKE. We think it will, if I may proceed.

Senator DAVIS. May I ask if your company contributes to the pension plan?

Mr. FISKE. The company contributes a fixed amount and the employee can add as much as he wishes but is not required as a condition of having the benefit to make the payment and contribute himself.

Senator DAVIS. As a condition of employment he is not required to take part?

Mr. FISKE. No. When he becomes employed the company automatically sets up a certain amount with respect to pension in his behalf, and if he wishes to contribute he may do so to increase the pension, but he is not required to do so.

Senator DAVIS. Thank you. Who are eligible to be members of the council?

Mr. FISKE. Any employee.

Senator DAVIS. Foremen?

Mr. FISKE. Yes, sir, if the employees choose to elect him. Of course, the votes in any one division would give the employees complete control. In other words, if they elected a foreman it would be their own choice.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the council composed of representatives of the various departments?

Mr. FISKE. Yes, we have 10 arbitrary divisions.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, one council member from the clerical department and one from one processing department and another from another processing department?

Mr. FISKE. We have the plant divided into 10 divisions, some of which take in small sections. Each division has representation in proportion to the number of its members. There is a formula worked out whereby they get from 1 to 3, depending upon the number of employees in the particular division.

Senator MURPHY. Is the election by secret ballot?

Mr. FISKE. Yes, sir.

Senator DAVIS. The membership includes the heads of the divisions? That is, the head of the division is a part of the organization?

Mr. FISKE. What do you mean by the head of the division, the department head?

Senator DAVIS. The foreman of that particular division is also a member of the employees' representative plan?

Mr. FISKE. Oh, no; not unless he is elected. In most cases he is not.

Mr. WHISLER. He is allowed to vote, if that is what you mean.

Senator DAVIS. He is permitted to vote?

Mr. FISKE. Yes, he has a vote in the election.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the employees, the members of the council, change the bylaws as they choose from time to time without approval by anybody else?

Mr. FISKE. We have a constitution which can only be amended by general election of the entire association which means the entire employees.

The CHAIRMAN. But it does not require the assent or approval of the employers?

Mr. FISKE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator DAVIS. If there are any disagreements, do you have any right of appeal to anyone from the organization?

Mr. FISKE. Disagreement of what sort?

Senator DAVIS. Is the decision of your organization final? For instance, someone is aggrieved by a decision of the organization; is there any right of appeal or is the vote of the organization final? I mean, do you appeal to the president of the company or the general manager of the company or somebody?

Mr. FISKE. You mean if the council makes a decision and it is not upheld by the management?

Senator DAVIS. Yes; I mean, for instance, the council would make a decision; is there any appeal from that, from the council, or is that final?

Mr. FISKE. You mean if the employees disagree with the council?

Senator DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. FISKE. The council would find it out very quickly and would be told that the representatives had not represented the true opinion of the employees and they would go back into meeting and reconsider their action.

Senator DAVIS. Who tells them that?

Mr. FISKE. The employees. They do not hesitate to speak up. That happened once last summer.

Senator DAVIS. The final decision is with the employees themselves?

Mr. FISKE. Yes; in other words, council is supposed to be the voice of the employees in its dealings with management. The representatives from these 10 divisions have to find out what the employees' sentiment is from their constituents and be guided accordingly when they get into council meeting.

Senator DAVIS. What I have in mind is in a case when an employee has a grievance, he comes to the council, council makes a ruling, and if he is still aggrieved, is there any appeal from that particular council, and, if so, to whom? Does council report back to the employees and they have to confirm it?

Mr. FISKE. I don't quite follow the question. For instance, we have as a committee of council an appeal board which is set up for the purpose of hearing any case of dissatisfaction other than a rate case. There is an entirely separate body which would hear individual grievance on a rate.

But, supposing a man is laid off, we will say, or is discharged, supposedly for cause, and he appeals the case to the appeal board; they hear it, and if they feel the decision was right, that he was asleep on the job, for instance, and the foreman did right in firing him, all right; if they do not feel the decision was right they inform council that they recommend him to be reinstated or they recommend that the man be transferred.

Now, the council reports that finding over its signature to the management of the company, the president and his immediate executive committee, and in every csae that has ever come before the appeal board the decision has been final by the management. There has never been a disagreement. When they found that a man who had been discharged should be reinstated or transferred to another department that decision has never been overruled by management.

The CHAIRMAN. You have given us a very excellent illustration of a company union that is apparently not dominated.

Mr. FISKE. My next point that I want to make very clearly is one that I believe has been an objection in some such organization. Management is not represent, at the meetings of council. Therefore, council's discussions and decisions are free from management influence. Council is at liberty to make recommendations based solely upon the employees' viewpoints, and has shown no hesitancy in so doing. Recommendations originating in council and counterproposals to management proposals have, in most cases, been accepted by management. In all cases where management has not immediately accepted a recommendation of council, a compromise agreement, satisfactory to the majority of the employees, has ultimately been reached.

4. We submit that our present internal organization, representing all the employees, accomplishes much, through mutual understanding between management and the employees, which would be impossible between management and an outside agency or any agency representing only part of the employees. The present council is in a position to recognize and refrain from making unreasonable demands, including those which would work for the benefit of a minority at the expense of other employees. The effect of this policy on the part of council has been to strengthen any recommendation endorsed by it.

5. No other form of representation could adequately represent the entire group of I. & N. employees. Only about half of our employees would be eligible for membership in the usual type of labor organization. As we understand the Wagner bill, it would automatically disfranchise a large group of our employees.

An organization representing only hourly workers, for example, might very easily obtain a management decision favorable to them at the expense of salaried workers. The effect of an organization which represented only part of the employees would be to pit one group of employees against another, which is undesirable. Our present council, because its membership represents every employee viewpoint, is in a position to prepare recommendations which properly balance the interests of the employees as a whole. We submit that our cooperative association preserves a unified body of employees which would be split by internal differences under any other form of representation known to us.

6. While it is true that the company has granted our present organization the privilege of holding meetings on company property and on company time, and has budgeted an allowance for minor incidental expenses in addition to its contributions to the activities already outlined, this support does not operate to influence the opinions or recommendations of council. The sponsors of the Wagner bill may point out that management could terminate the activities of our organization by withdrawing its support, but our company has never indicated by any of its actions that such a step would be taken. However, in the event that the company's support should ever be withdrawn, there would be no interruption of employee representation. Under such circumstances the present setup would provide ample initiative and leadership to maintain the activities of the association.

7. One of the stated purposes of the Wagner bill is "to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees." We believe our cooperative association has gone one step further. Past relationships have fostered a feeling of mutual respect between council and management. The result has been that differences of opinion have been settled constructively, through an exchange of ideas, without the occurrence of an actual dispute. This has been our experience with the vitally important problems handled during the period of depression, and has convinced us that our present cooperative association is eminently fitted to settle disputes by avoiding them.

To summarize our presentation, we have appeared before you to testify that the cooperative association we represent has proved its worth over a period of years. We have outlined briefly how this has been accomplished. We have endeavored to show that our employees would have lost certain definite advantages which they now enjoy if their present form of representation should be made illegal, and that our organization is free from certain objections which have been cited as characteristics of so-called "company unions." While we represent only one such organization, we are certain that there are other companies where organizations such as ours are operating satisfactorily, and still others where such organizations could operate for the best interests of the employees. It is our contention that the restrictions which the Wagner bill places upon employers definitely limit employees in their right to choose the type of organization they want to represent them. Therefore, we ask that you amend the Wagner bill (particularly sec. 5, which defined "unfair labor practices") insofar as may be necessary to permit the employees of a specific company to choose or reject a form of representation such as we have described, instead of legislating all such organizations out of existence.

Senator MURPHY. By that you mean that you do not permit the employees to vote on the question of whether or not they should join an outside union?

Mr. FISKE. Yes, sir. In other words, in our particular case our management has stated time and again that if we do not like that it is our privilege to dispose of it immediately. The reason we have been sent down here by the employees without the company even knowing we were coming, really, is because the employees want to continue it.

Now, where it is entirely voluntary, our plea is that we be allowed to continue it.
